

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

22415.44.27.5

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

John H. Hagan
The Prior
Sept 30th 1881

THE
HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD.

A New Novel,

UNIFORM WITH THE VOLUME, AND BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Price, $1 75.

---

WYLDER'S HAND.

** Sent by Mail, Free, on receipt of price.

BY CARLETON, PUBLISHER, NEW YORK.

THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD,

A Novel

BY

J. SHERIDAN LE FANU,
Author of "Wylder's Hand," "Uncle Silas," etc.

THREE VOLUMES IN ONE.

NEW YORK:
CARLETON, PUBLISHER, 413 BROADWAY.

LONDON: TINSLEY & CO.

MDCCLXVI.

1866

(58)

~~D.38586~~

2 2415.44.27.5

HARVARD UNIVERSITY
LIBRARY

THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD.

---

A PROLOGUE—BEING A DISH OF VILLAGE CHAT.

WE are going to talk in the ensuing chapters of what was going on in Chapelizod about a hundred years ago. In those days it was the gayest and prettiest of the outpost villages in which old Dublin took a complacent pride. The poplars which stood in military rows here and there, just showed a glimpse of formality among the orchards and old timber that lined the banks of the river and the valley of the Liffey with a lively sort of richness. The broad old street looked hospitable and merry, with steep roofs and many colored hall doors. The jolly old inn, just beyond the turnpike at the sweep of the road, leading over the buttressed bridges by the mill, was first to welcome the excursionist from Dublin, under the sign of the Phœnix. There, in the grand wainscotted back parlor, with "the great and good King William," in his robe, garter, periwig and sceptre, presiding in the panel over the chimney piece, and confronting the large projecting window, through which the river, and the daffodils, and the summer foliage looked so bright and quiet, the Aldermen of Skinner's-alley—a club of the "true blue" dye, as old as the Jacobite wars of the previous century—the corporation of Shoemakers, or of Tailors, or the Freemasons, or the musical clubs, loved to dine at the stately hour of five, and deliver their jokes, sentiments, songs, and wisdom, on a pleasant summer evening. Alas! the inn is as clean gone as the guests—a dream of the shadow of smoke.

Lately, too, came down the old "Salmon House," so called from the blazonry of that noble fish upon its painted sign-board—at the other end of the town, that, with a couple more, wheeled out at right angles from the line of the broad street, and directly confronting the passenger from Dublin, gave to it something of the character of a square, and just left room for the high road and Martin's row to slip between its flank and the orchard that overtopped the river wall.

Then there was the village church, with its tower dark and rustling from base to summit, with thick piled, bowering ivy. The royal arms cut in bold relief in the broad stone over the porch—where, pray, is that stone now, the memento of its old viceregal dignity? The "Ecclesiastical Commissioners" have done their office here. The tower, indeed, remains, with half its antique growth of ivy gone; but the body of the church is new, and I miss the old-fashioned square pews distributed by a traditional tenure among the families and dignitaries of the town and vicinage, and sigh for the rum, old, clumsy reading-desk and pulpit, grown dearer from the long and hopeless separation; and wonder where the tables of the Ten Commandments, in long gold letters of Queen Anne's date, upon a vivid blue ground, arched above, and flanking the communion-table, with its tall queer rails, and fifty other things that appeared to me in my non-age, as stable as the earth, and as sacred as the heavens, are gone to.

As for the barracks of the Royal Irish Artillery, the great gate leading into the parade ground, by the river side, and all that, I believe that grim giant factory, which is now the grand feature of the centre of Chapelizod, throbbing all over with steam, and whizzing with wheels, and vomiting pitchy smoke, has swallowed them up.

A line of houses fronting this—old familiar faces—still look blank and regretfully forth, through their glassy eyes.

upon the changed scene. How different the company they kept some ninety or a hundred years ago ?

Where is the mill, too, standing fast by the bridge, the manorial appendage of the town, which I loved in my boyhood for its gaunt and crazy aspect and dim interior, whence the clapper kept time mysteriously to the drone of the mill-sluice ? I think it is gone. Surely that confounded thing can't be my venerable old friend in masquerade !

But hang it ! I can't expect you, my reader, to potter about with me, all the summer day, through this melancholy and mangled old town, with a canopy of factory soot between your head and the pleasant sky. One glance, however, before you go, at the village tree—that stalworth elm. It has not grown an inch these hundred years. It does not look a day older than it did fifty years ago, I can tell you. There he stands the same ; and yet a stranger in the place of his birth, in a new order of things, joyless, busy, transformed Chapelized. Thou hast a story, too, to tell, thou slighted and solitary sage, if only the winds would steal it musically forth, like the secret of Midas from the moaning reeds.

When your humble servant, the compiler of this narrative, was a boy some fourteen years old, it came to pass that he was spending a pleasant week of his holidays with his benign uncle and godfather, the curate of Chapelized. On the second day of his, or rather my sojourn (I take leave to return to the first person), there was a notable funeral of an old lady. Her name was Darby, and her journey to her last home was very considerable, being made in a hearse, by easy stages, from her house at Lisnabane, in the county of Sligo, to the churchyard of Chapelized. There was a great flat stone over that small parcel of the rector's freehold, which the family held by a tenure, not of lives, but of deaths, renewable for ever. So that my uncle had little trouble in satisfying himself of the identity of this narrow tenement, to which Lemuel Mattox, the sexton, led him as straight and confidently as he would to the communion table.

My uncle, therefore, flated the sexton's presentment, and the work commenced forthwith. I don't know whether all boys have the same liking for horrors which I am conscious of having possessed—I only know that I liked the churchyard, and deciphering tombstones, and watching the labors of the sexton, and hearing the old-world village talk that often got up over the relics.

When this particular grave was pretty nearly finished—it lay from east to west—a lot of earth fell out at the northern side, where an old coffin had lain, and good store of brown dust and grimy bones, and the yellow skull itself came tumbling about the sexton's feet. These fossils, after his wont, he lifted decently with the point of his shovel, and pitched into a little nook beside the great mound of mould at top.

"Be the powers o' war! here's a batthered headpiece for yez," said young Tim Moran, who had picked up the cranium, and was eyeing it curiously, turning it round the while.

"Show it here, Tim;" "let me look," cried two or three neighbors, getting round as quickly as they could.

"Oh! murdher!" said one.

"Oh! be the powers o' Moll Kelly!" cried another.

"That poor fellow got no chance for his life, at all, at all!" said Tim.

"That was a bullet," said one of them, putting his finger into a clean circular aperture as large as a half-penny.

"An' look at them two cracks. Och, murther!"

"Aich o' them a wipe iv a poker."

Mattocks had climbed nimbly to the upper level, and taking the skull in his fist, turned it about this way and that, curiously. But though he was no chicken, his memory did not go far enough back to throw any light upon the matter.

"Could it be the Mattross that was shot in the year '90, as I often heerd, for sthrikin' his captain?" suggested a bystander.

"Oh! that poor fellow's buried round by the north side of the church," said Mattocks, still eyeing the skull. "It could not be Counsellor Gallagher, that was kilt in the jewel with Colonel Ruck—he was shot in the head—bud it could not be—ugh! not at all."

"Why not, Misther Mattocks?"

"No, nor the Mattross neither. This, ye see, is a dhry bit o' the yard here; there's ould Darby's coffin, at the bottom, down there, sound enough to stand on, as you see, wid a plank; an' he was buried in the year '93. Why, look at the coffin this skull belongs to, 'tid go into powdher between your fingers; 'tis nothin' but tindher."

"I believe you're right, Mr. Mattocks."

"Phiat! to be sure. 'Tis longer undher ground by thirty years, good, or more maybe."

Just then the slim figure of my tall mild uncle, the curate, appeared, and his long thin legs, in black worsted stockings and knee-breeches, stepped reverently and lightly among the graves. The men raised their hats, and Mattocks jumped lightly into the grave again, while my uncle returned their salute with the sad sort of a smile, a regretful kindness, which he never exceeded, in these solemn precincts.

It was his custom to care very tenderly for the bones turned up by the sexton, and to wait with an awful solicitude until, after the reading of the funeral service, he saw them gently replaced, as nearly as might be, in their old bed; and discouraging all idle curiosity or levity respecting them, with a solemn rebuke, which all respected. Therefore it was, that so soon as he appeared the skull was, in Hibernian phrase, "dropt like a hot potato," and the grave-digger betook himself to his spade so nimbly.

"Oh! Uncle Charles," I said, taking his hand, and leading him towards the foot of the grave ; " such a wonderful skull has come up ! It is shot through with a bullet, and cracked with a poker, besides."

" 'Tis throe for him, your Raverence ; he was murdered twist over, whoever he was—rest his sowl ;" and the sexton, who had nearly completed his work, got out of the grave again, and raising the brown relic with great reverence, out of regard for my good uncle, he turned it about slowly before the eyes of the curate, who scrutinized it, from a little distance, with a sort of melancholy horror.

" Yes, Lemuel," said my uncle, still holding my hand, " 'twas undoubtedly a murder ; ay, indeed ! He sustained two heavy blows, beside that gunshot through the head."

" 'Twasn't a gunshot, sir ; why the hole 'id take in a grape-shot," said an old fellow, just from behind my uncle, in a pensioner's cocked-hat, leggings, and long old-world red frock-coat, speaking with a harsh reedy voice, and a grim sort of reserved smile.

I moved a little aside, with a sort of thrill, to give him freer access to my uncle, in the hope that he might, perhaps, throw a light upon the history of this remarkable memorial.

" You don't think it a bullet wound, sir ?" said my uncle, mildly, and touching his hat—for coming of a military stock himself, he always treated an old soldier with uncommon respect.

" Why, please your Raverence," replied the man, reciprocating his courtesy ; " I know it's not."

" And what is it, then, my good man ?" interrogated the sexton, as one in authority, and standing on his own dung-hill.

" The trepan," said the fogey, in the tone in which he'd have cried " attention " to a raw recruit, without turning his head, and with a scornful momentary skew-glance from his gray eye.

" And do you know whose skull that was, sir ?" asked the curate.

"Ay do I, sir, well," with the same queer smile, he answered. "Come, now, you're a grave-digger, my fine fellow," he continued, accosting the sexton cynically; "how long do you suppose that skull's been under ground?"

"Long enough; but not so long, my fine fellow, as your's has been above ground."

"Well, you're right there, for I seen him buried," and he took the skull from the sexton's hands; "and I'll tell you more, there was some dry eyes, too, at his funeral—ha, ha, ha!"

"You were a resident of the town, then?" said my uncle, who did not like the turn his recollections were taking.

"Ay, sir, that I was," he replied; "see that broken tooth, there—the minute I seen it, I remembered it like this morning—I could swear to it—when he laughed; ay, and that sharp corner to it—hang him," and he twirled the loose tooth, the last but two of all its fellows, from its socket, and chucked it into the grave.

"And weré you—you weren't in the army, then?" inquired the curate, who could not understand the sort of scoffing dislike he seemed to bear it.

"Be my faith I was so, sir—the Royal Irish Artillery," replied he, promptly.

"And in what capacity?" pursued his Reverence.

"Drummer," answered the mulberry-faced veteran.

"Ho!—Drummer? That's a good time ago, I dare say," said my uncle, looking on him reflectively.

"Well, so it is, not far off fifty years," answered he. "He was a hard-headed codger, he was; but you see the sprig of shillelagh was too hard for him—ha, ha, ha!" and he gave the skull a smart knock with his walking-cane, as he grinned at it, and wagged his head.

"Gently, gently, my good man," said the curate, placing his hand hastily on his arm, for the knock was harder than was needed for the purpose of demonstration.

"You see, sir, at that time, our Colonel-in-Chief was my Lord Blackwater," continued the old soldier, "not that we often seen him, for he lived in France mostly; the Colonel-en-Second was General Chatterworth, and Colonel Stafford was Lieutenant-Colonel, and under him Major O'Neill; Captains, four—Cluffe, Devereux, Barton, and Burgh; First Lieutenants—Puddock, Delany, Sackville, and Armstrong; Second Lieutenants—Salt, Barber, Lillyman, and Pringle; Lieutenant Fireworkers—O'Flaherty"—

"I beg your pardon," interposed my uncle, "'Fireworkers' did you say?"

"Yes, sir."

"And what, pray, does a Lieutenant Fireworker mean?"

"Why, Law bless you, sir! a Fireworker! 'twas his business to see that the men loaded, sarved, laid, and fired the gun all right. But that doesn't signify; you see this old skull, sir: well, 'twas a nine days' wonder, and the queerest business you ever heard tell of. Why, sir, the women were frightened out of their senses, and the men puzzled out o' their wits—they wor—ha, ha, ha! and I can tell you all about it—a mighty black and bloody business it was"—

"I—I beg your pardon, sir; but I think—yes—the funeral has arrived; and for the present, I must bid you good-morning."

And so my uncle hurried to the church, where he assumed his gown, and the solemn rite proceeded.

When all was over, my uncle, after his wont, waited until he had seen the disturbed remains re deposited decently in their place; and then, having disrobed, I saw him look with some interest about the church-yard, and I knew 'twas in quest of the old soldier.

"I saw him go away during the funeral," I said.

"Ay, the old pensioner," said my uncle, peering about in quest of him.

And we walked through the town, and over the bridge and we saw nothing of his cocked-hat and red single-breasted frock, and returned rather disappointed to tea.

I ran into the back room which commanded the church-yard in the hope of seeing the old fellow once more, with his cane shouldered, grinning among the tombstones in the evening sun. But there was no sign of him, or indeed of any one else there. So I returned, just as my uncle, having made the tea, shut down the lid of his silver tea-pot with a little smack; and with a kind but absent smile upon me, he took his book, sat down, and crossed one of his thin legs over the other, and waited pleasantly until the delightful infusion should be ready for our lips.

In the meantime, I, who thirsted more for that tale of terror which the old soldier had all but begun, of which in that strangely battered skull I had only an hour ago seen face to face so grizzly a memento, looked out dejectedly from the window, when, whom should I behold marching up the street, at slow time, towards the Salmon House, but the identical old soldier, just under the village tree.

"Here he is, O! uncle Charles, here he comes," I cried.

"Eh, the old soldier, is he?" said my uncle, tripping in the carpet in his eagerness, and all but breaking the window.

"So it is, indeed; run down, my boy, and beg him to come up."

But by the time I reached the street, I found my uncle had got the window up and was himself inviting the old boy, who having brought his left shoulder forward, thanked the curate, saluting soldier fashion, with his hand to his hat, palm foremost. I've observed, indeed, that those grim old campaigners who have seen the world, make it a principle to accept anything in the shape of a treat. If it's bad, why, it costs them nothing; and if good, so much the better.

So up he marched, and into the room with soldierly self-possession, and being offered tea, preferred punch, and the ingredients were soon on the little round table by the fire, and the old fellow being seated, he brewed his nectar to his heart's content ; and as we sipped our tea in pleasant attention, he, after his own fashion, commenced the story, to which I listened with an interest which I confess has never subsided.

Many years after, a flood of light was unexpectedly poured over the details of his narrative ; on my coming into possession of the diary, curiously minute, and the voluminous correspondence of Rebecca, sister to General Chatterworth, with whose family I had the honor to be connected. And this journal, to me, with my queer cat-like affection for this old village, a perfect treasure—and the interminable bundles of letters, sorted and arranged so neatly, from all and to all manner of persons—for the industrious lady made fair copies of all the letters she wrote—formed for many years my occasional, and always pleasant winter's night's reading.

I wish I could infuse their spirit into what I am going to tell, and above all that I could inspire my readers with ever so little of the peculiar interest with which the old town has always been tinted and saddened to my eye. My boyish imagination, perhaps, kindled all the more at the story, by reason of its being a good deal connected with the identical old house in which we three—my dear uncle, my idle self, and the queer old soldier—were then sitting. But wishes are as vain as regrets ; so I'll just do my best, bespeaking your attention, and submissively abiding your judgment.

CHAPTER I.

THE RECTOR'S NIGHT-WALK TO HIS CHURCH.

A.D. 1767—in the beginning of the month of May—I mention it because, as I said, I write from memoranda, an awfully dark night came down on Chapelizod and all the country round.

I believe there was no moon, and the stars had been quite put out under the “wet blanket of the night,” which impenetrable muffler overspread the sky with a funereal darkness.

There was a little of that sheet lightning early in the evening, which betokens sultry weather. The clouds came up sullenly over the Dublin mountains, their slow but steady motion contrasting with the awful stillness of the air. There was a weight in the atmosphere, and a sort of undefined menace brooding over the little town, as if unseen crime or danger—some mystery of iniquity—was stealing into the heart of it, and the disapproving heavens scowled a melancholy warning.

A large square letter, with a great round seal, as big as a crown piece, addressed to the Rev. Hugh Walsingham, Doctor of Divinity, at his house, by the bridge, in Chapelizod, had reached him in the morning, and plainly troubled him. He kept the messenger a good hour awaiting his answer; and, just at two o'clock, the same messenger returned with a second letter—but this time a note sufficed for reply. “‘Twill seem ungracious,” said the doctor, knitting his brows over his closed folio in the study; “but I cannot choose but walk clear in my calling before the Lord. How can I honestly pronounce hope, when in my mind there is nothing but fear—let another do it if he see his way—I do enough in being present, as 'tis right. I should."

It was, indeed, a remarkably dark night—a rush and down, pour of rain! The doctor stood just under the porch of the stout brick house—which was then the residence of the worthy rector of Chapelized—with his great surtout and cape on—his leggings buttoned up—and his capacious leather "overalls" pulled up and strapped over these—and his broad-leafed hat tied down with a mighty silk kerchief. Old Sally, with her kind, mild, grave face, and gray locks, stood modestly behind in the hall; and pretty Lillias, his only child, gave him her parting kiss, and her last grand charge about his shoes and other exterior toggery, in the porch; and he patted her cheek with a little fond laugh, taking old John Tracy's, the butler's, arm. John carried a handsome horn lantern, which flashed now on the roadside bush—now on the discolored battlements of the bridge—and now on a streaming window. They stepped out—there were no umbrellas in those days—splashing among the wide and widening pools; while Sally and Lillias stood in the porch, holding candles for full five minutes after the doctor and his "Jack-o'-the-lantern," as he called honest John, whose arm and candle always befriended him in his night excursions, had got round the corner.

The doctor's lantern glided by—and then across the street—and so leisurely along the foot-way, by the range of lightless hall-doors toward the Salmon House, also dark; and so, sharp round the corner, and up to the church-yard gate, which stood a little open, as also the church door beyond as was evidenced by the feeble glow of a lantern from within.

I dare say old Bob Martin, the sexton, and grave Mr. Irons, the clerk, were reassured when they heard the cheery voice of the rector hailing them by name. There were now three candles in church; but the edifice looked unpleasantly dim, and went off at the far end into total darkness. Ze-kiel Irons was a lean, reserved fellow, with a black wig and blue chin, and something shy and sinister in his phiz. I don't think he had entertained honest Bob with much conversation during their tête-à-tête among the black windows and the mural tablets that overhung the aisle.

But the rector had lots to say—though deliberately and gravely, still the voice was genial and inspiring—and exorcised the shadows that had been gathering stealthily around the lesser church functionaries. Mrs. Irons' tooth, he learned was still bad; but she was no longer troubled with "that sour humor in her stomach." Bob Martin thanked his reverence; "the cold rheumatism in his hip was better." Irons, the clerk, replied, "he had brought two prayer-books." Bob averred "he could not be mistaken; the old lady was buried in the near vault; though it was forty years before, he remembered it like last night. They changed her into her lead coffin in the vault—he and the undertaker together—her own servants would not put a hand to her. She was buried in white satin, and with her rings on her fingers. It was her fancy, and so ordered in her will. They said she was mad. He'd know her face again if he saw her. She had a long hooked nose; and her eyes were open. For, as he was told, she died in her sleep, and was quite cold and stiff when they found her in the morning. He went down and saw the coffin to-day half an hour after meeting his Reverence."

The rector consulted his great warming-pan of a watch. It was drawing near eleven. He fell into a reverie, and rambled slowly up and down the aisle, with his hands behind his back, and his dripping hat in them, swinging nearly to the flags—now lost in the darkness—now emerging again, dim, nebulous, in the foggy light of the lanterns. The doctor was thinking all the time upon the one text:—Why should this livid memorial of two great crimes be now disturbed, after an obscurity of twenty-one years, as if to jog the memory of scandal, and set the great throat of the monster baying once more at the old midnight horror ?

And as for that old house at Ballyfermot, why any one could have looked after it as well as he. "Still, he must live somewhere, and certainly this little town is quieter than the city, and the people, on the whole, very kindly, and by no means curious." This latter was a mistake of the doctor's, who, like other simple persons, was fond of regarding others as harmless repetitions of himself. "And his sojourn will be," he says, "but a matter of weeks;" and the doctor's mind wandered back again to the dead, and forward to the remoter consequences of his guilt, so he heaved a heavy, honest sigh, and lifted up his head and slackened his pace for a little prayer, and with that there came the rumble of wheels to the church door.

---

CHAPTER II.

THE NAMELESS COFFIN.

THREE vehicles with flambeaux, and the clang and snorting of horses came close to the church porch, and there appeared suddenly, standing within the disk of candle-light at the church-door, a tall, very pale, and peculiar looking young man, with very large, melancholy eyes, and a certain cast of evil pride in his handsome face.

John Tracy lighted the wax candles which he had brought, and Bob Martin stuck them in the sockets at either side of the cushion, on the ledge of the pew, beside the aisle, where the prayer-book lay open at "the burial of the dead," and the rest of the party drew about the door, while the doctor was shaking hands very ceremoniously with that tall young man, who had now stepped into the circle of light, with a short, black mantle on, and his black curls uncovered, and a certain air of high breeding in his movements. "He reminded me painfully of him who is gone, whom we name not," said the doctor to pretty Lillas, when he got home; "he has his pale, delicately-formed features, with a shadow of his evil passions, too, and his mother's large, sad eyes."

And an elderly clergyman, in surplice, band, and white wig, with a hard, yellow, furrowed face, hovered in, like a white bird of night, from the darkness behind, and was introduced to Dr. Walsingham, and whispered for a while to Mr. Irons, and then to Bob Martin, who had two short forms placed transversely in the aisle to receive what was coming, and a shovel full of earth—all ready. So, while the angular clergyman ruffled into the front of the pew, with Irons on one side, a little in the rear, both books open; the plump little undertaker whispered a word or two to the young gentleman [Mr. Mervyn, the doctor called him], and Mr. Mervyn disappeared. Doctor Walsingham and John Tracy got into contiguous seats, and Bob Martin went out to lend a hand. Then came the shuffling of feet, and the sound of hard-tugging respiration, and the suppressed, energetic, mutual directions of the undertaker's men, who supported the ponderous coffin.

A great oak shell: the lid was outside in the porch, Mr. Tressels was unwilling to screw it down, having heard that the entrance to the vault was narrow, and apprehending it might be necessary to take the coffin out. So it lies its length with a dull weight on the two forms. The lead coffin inside, with its dusty black velvet, was plainly much older.

There was a plate on it with two bold capitals, and a full stop after each, thus :

R. D.
obiit May 11th,
A.D. 1746. ætat 38.

And above this plain, oval plate was a little ornament no bigger than a sixpence. John Tracy took it for a star, Bob Martin said he knew it to be a Freemason's order, and Mr. Tressels, who almost overlooked it, thought it was nothing better than a fourpenny cherub. But Mr. Irons, the clerk, knew that it was a coronet; and when he heard the other theories thrown out, being a man of few words, he let them have it their own way, and coldly kept this little bit of knowledge to himself.

Earth to earth (rumble), dust to dust (tumble), ashes to ashes (rattle).

And now the coffin must go out again, and down to its final abode.

The flag that closed the entrance of the vault had been removed. Young Mervyn had gone down the steps to see it duly placed; a murky, fiery light came up, against which the descending figures looked black and cyclopean.

Dr. Walsingham offered his brother clergyman his hospitalities; but somehow that cleric preferred returning to town for his supper and his bed. Mervyn also excused himself. It was late; and he meant to stay that night at the Phoenix, and to-morrow designed to make his compliments in person to Dr. Walsingham. So the bilious clergyman from town climbed into the vehicle in which he had come, and the undertaker and his troop got into the hearse and the mourning coach and drove off demurely through the town. Dr. Walsingham, with the aid of his guide, soon reached the little garden in front of the old house, and the gay tinkle of a harpsichord and the notes of a sweet contralto suddenly ceased as he did so; and he said—smiling in the dark, in a pleasant soliloquy, for he did not mind John Tracy—old John was not in the way—"She always hears my step—always—little Lily, no matter how she's employed," and the hall-door opened, and a voice that was gentle, and yet somehow very spirited and sweet, cried a loving and playful welcome to the old man.

---

CHAPTER III.

MR. MERVYN IN HIS INN.

THE morning was fine—the sun shone out with a yellow splendor—all nature was refreshed—a pleasant smell rose up from tree, and flower, and earth. The now dry pavement and all the row of village windows were glittering merrily—the sparrows twittered their lively morning gossip among the thick ivy of the old church tower—here and there the village cock challenged his neighbor with high and vaunting crow, and the bugle notes soared sweetly into the air from the artillery ground beside the river.

Moore, the barber, was already busy making his morning circuit, serving men and maids were dropping in and out at the baker's, and old Poll Delany, in her weather-stained red hood, and neat little Kitty Lane, with her bright, young, careful face and white basket, were calling at the doors of their customers with new-laid eggs. Through half-opened hall-doors you might see the powdered servant, or the sprightly maid in her mob-cap in hot haste steaming away with the red-japanned "tea kitchen" into the parlor. The town of Chapelizod, in short, was just sitting down to its breakfast.

Mervyn, in the meantime, had had his solitary meal in the famous back parlor of the Phoenix, where the newspapers lay, and all comers were welcome. He was by no means a bad hero to look at, if such a thing were needed. His face was pale, melancholy, statuesque—and his large enthusiastic eyes suggested a story, and a secret—perhaps a horror. Most men, had they known all, would have wondered with good Doctor Walsingham, why he should have chosen the little town where he now stood for even a temporary residence. It was not a perversity—but rather a fascination. His whole life had been a flight and a pursuit—a vain endeavor to escape from the evil spirit that pursued him—and a chase of a wild chimera.

He was standing at the window, not indeed enjoying, as another man might, the quiet verdure of the scene, and all the mellowed sounds of village life, but lost in a sad and dreadful reverie, when in bounces little redfaced, bustling Dr. Toole,—the joke and the chuckle with which he had just requited the fat old barmaid still ringing in the passage: “Stay there, sweetheart,” addressed to a dog squeezing by him, and which screeched as he kicked it neatly round the doorpost.

“Hay, your most obedient,” cried the doctor, with a short but grand bow, affecting surprise, though his chief object in visiting the back parlor at that moment was precisely to make a personal inspection of the stranger, “Pray, don’t mind me, sir—your—ho! Breakfast ended, eh? Coffee not so bad, sir; rather good coffee, I hold it, at the Phoenix. Cream very choice, sir? I don’t tell ’em so, though (a wink) it might not improve it, you know. And no disputing the eggs, forty-eight hens in the poultry yard, and ninety ducks in Tresham’s little garden next door to Sturk’s. They make a precious noise, I can tell you, when it showers. Sturk threatens to shoot ’em. He’s the artillery surgeon here; and Tom Larkin said, last night, it’s because they only dabble and quack, and two of a trade, you know—ha! ha! ha! And what a night we had! Dark as Erebus; pouring like pumps, by Jove. I'll remember it, I warrant you. Out on business! A medical man, you know, can't always choose; and near meeting a bad accident too. Any thing in the paper, eh? ho! I see, sir; haven't read it. Well, and what do you think—a queer night for the purpose, eh? you'll say, we had a funeral in the town last night, sir, some one from Dublin. It was Tressel's men came out. The turnpike rogue, just round the corner there—one of the worst gossips in the town—and a confounded prying, tattling place it is,—knows the driver; and Bob Martin—the sexton, you know—tells me there were two parsons, no less—hey! Cauliflowers in season, by Jove! Old Dr. Washington, our rector—a pious man, sir, and does a world of good—that's to say, relieves half the blackguards in the parish—ha! ha! when we're on the point of getting rid of them—but means well, only he's a little bit lazy, and queer, you know; and that rancid, raw-boned parson, Gillespie, how the plague did they pick him up? one of the mutes told Bob it was he. He's from Donegal; I know all about him; the sourest dog I ever broke bread with—and a mason, if you please, by Jove—a prince pelican! He supped at the Grand Lodge, after labor, one night—you're not a mason, I see; tipt you the sign—and his face was so small and so yellow, I was near squeezing it into the punch-bowl for a lemon—ha! ha! hey?"

Mervyn's large eyes expressed a well-bred but stern surprise. Dr. Toole paused for nearly a minute, as if expecting something in return; but it did not come.

So the Dr. started afresh, never perceiving Mervyn's somewhat dangerous aspect—"Mighty pretty prospects about here, sir. The painters come out by dozens in the summer, with their books and pencils, and scratch away like so many Scotchmen, ha! ha! ha!

If you draw, sir, there's one prospect up the river, by the mills—upon my conscience—but you don't draw?

No answer.

"A little, sir, maybe? Just for a maggot, I'll wager—like my good lady, Mrs. Toole. A nearer glance at his dress had satisfied Toole that he was too much of a maccaroni for an artist, and he was thinking of placing him upon the Lord Lieutenant's staff.

"If you design to stay over the day, and care for shooting we'll have some ball practice on Palmerstown fair-green to-day. Seven baronies to shoot for ten and five guineas. One o'clock—hey?"

At this moment entered Major O'Neill, of the Royal Irish Artillery, a small man, very neatly got up, and with a decidedly Milesian cast of countenance, who said little, but smiled agreeably—

"Gentlemen, your most obedient. Ha, doctor; how goes it,—any thing new—any thing on the Freeman?"

"Toole had scanned that paper, and hummed out, as he rumpled it over, "nothing—very—particular. Here's Lady Moira's ball; fancy dresses; all Irish; no masks; a numerous appearance of the nobility and gentry, upwards of five hundred persons. A good many of your corps there, Major?"

"Ay, Lord Blackwater, of course, and the General and Devereux, and little Puddock, and"—

"Sturk wasn't," with a grin, interrupted Toole, who bore that practitioner no good-will. "A gentleman robbed, by two foot-pads, on Chapelizod-road, on Wednesday night, of his watch and money, together with his hat, wig and cane, and lies now in a very dangerous state, having been much abused; one of them dressed in an old light-colored coat, wore a wig. By Jupiter, Major, if I was in General Chatterworth's place, with two hundred strapping fellows at my orders, I'd get a commission from Government to clear that road. By Jove! here's old Joe Napper, of Dirty-lane's dead Plenty of dry eyes after him. And stay, here's another row." And so he read on.

In the meantime, stout, tightly-braced Captain Cluffe, of the same corps, and little dark, hard faced, and solemn Mr. Nutter, of the Mills, Lord Castlemallard's agent, came in, and half a dozen more, chiefly members of the club, which met by night in the front parlor on the left, opposite the bar, where they entertained themselves with agreeable conversation, cards, backgammon, draughts, and an occasional song by Dr. Toole, who was a florid tenor, and used to give them, "While gentlefolks strut in silver and satins," or some other such ditty, with a recitation by plump little stage-stricken Ensign Puddock, who, in "thpite of hith lithp," gave rather spirited imitations of some of the players—Mossop, Sheridan, Macklin, Barry, and the rest. So Mervyn, the stranger, by no means affecting this agreeable society, took his cane and cocked.hat, and went out—the dark and handsome apparition—followed by curious glances from two or three pairs of eyes, and a whispered commentary and criticism from Toole.

He took a meditative ramble in "His Majesty's Park, the Phoenix;" and passing out at the Castleknock-gate, walked up the river, until he reached the ferry, which crossing, at the other side he found himself not very far from Palmerstown, through which village his return route to Chapelizod lay.

---

CHAPTER IV.

THE FAIR-GREEN OF PALMERSTOWN.

THERE were half-a-dozen carriages and a score of led horses outside the fair-green, a precious lot of ragamuffins, and a good resort to the public house opposite; and the gate being open, the artillery band, rousing all the echoes round with harmonious and exhilarating thunder, within—an occasional crack of a "Brown Bess," with a puff of white smoke over the hedges, being heard, and the cheers of the spectators, and sometimes a jolly chorus of many-toned laughter, all mixed together, and carried on with a pleasant running hum of voices; Mervyn, the stranger, reckoning on being unobserved in the crowd, and weary of the very solitude he courted, turned to his right, and so found himself upon the renowned fair-green of Palmerstown.

It was really a gay rural sight. The circular target stood, with its bright concentric rings, in conspicuous isolation, about a hundred yards away, against the green slope of the hill. The competitors, in their best Sunday suits, some armed with muskets and some with fowling-pieces—for they were not particular—and with bunches of ribbons fluttering in their three-cornered hats, and sprigs of gay flowers in an irregular cluster, while the spectators, in pleasant disorder, formed two broad, and many-colored parterres, broken into little groups, and separated by a wide, clear sweep of the green sward, running up from the marksman to the target.

In that luminous atmosphere the men of those days showed bright and gay. Such fine scarlet and gold waistcoats—such sky-blue and silver—such pea-green lutestrings—and pink silk linings—and flashing buckles—and courtly wigs—or becoming powder—went pleasantly with the brilliant costume of the stately dames and smiling lasses. There was a pretty sprinkling of uniforms, too—the whole picture in gentle motion, and the bugles and drums of the Royal Irish Artillery filling the air with inspiring music.

All the neighbors were there—merry little Dr. Toole, in his grandest wig and gold-headed cane, with three dogs at his heels—he seldom appeared without this sort of train—sometimes as many as seven—and his hearty voice was heard brawling at them by name, as he sauntered through the town of a morning, and their's occasionally in short screeches, responsive to the touch of his cane, when that remainder was provoked. Now it was, "Fairy, you savage, let that pig alone!" a yell and a scuffle—"Juno, drop it, you slut!"—or "Cæsar, you blackguard, where are you going?"

"Look at Sturk there, with his lordship," says Toole, to the fair Magnolia, with a wink and a nod, and a sneering grin. "Good natured dog that—ha! ha! You'll find he'll oust Nutter at last, and get the agency; that's what he's driving at—always undermining somebody." Doctor Sturk and Lord Castlemallard were talking apart on the high ground, and the artillery surgeon was pointing with his cane at distant objects. "I'll lay you fifty he's picking holes in Nutter's management this moment."

I'm afraid there was some truth in the theory, and Toole—though he did not remember to mention it—had an instinctive notion that Sturk had an eye upon the civil practice of the neighborhood, and was meditating a retirement from the army, and a serious invasion of his domain.

Fat, short, radiant, General Chatterworth—in full artillery uniform—was there, smiling, and making little speeches to the ladies, and bowing stiffly from his hips upward—his great cue playing all the time up and down his back, and sometimes so near the ground when he stood erect and threw back his head, that Toole, seeing Juno eyeing the appendage, rather viciously, thought it prudent to cut her speculations short with a smart kick.

His sister Rebecca—tall, erect, with grand lace, in a splendid stiff brocade, and with a fine fan—was certainly five-and-fifty, but still wonderfully fresh, and sometimes had quite a pretty little pink color—perfectly genuine—in her cheeks; command sat in her eye and energy on her lip—but though it was imperious and restless, there was something provokingly likeable and even pleasant in her face,

Her niece, Gertude, the General's daughter, was also tall, but very graceful—and, I am told, perfectly handsome, too; a little haughty and cold she looked, and that character even her smile failed to dissipate.

"Be the powers, she's mighty handsome!" observed "Lieutenant Fireworker" O'Flaherty, who, being a little stupid, did not remember that such a remark was not likely to please the charming Magnolia Macnamara, to whom he had transferred the adoration of a passionate, but somewhat battered heart,

"They must not see with my eyes that think so," said Mag, with a disdainful toss of her head.

"They say she's not twenty, but I'll wager a pipe of claret she's something to the back of it," says O'Flaherty, mending his hand.

"Why, bless your innocence, she'll never see five-and-twenty, and a bit to spare," sneered Miss Mag, who might truly have told that tale of herself. "Who's that pretty young man my Lord Castlemallard is introducing to her and old Chatterworth?" The commendation was a shot at poor O'Flaherty.

"Hey—so, my Lord knows him!" says Toole, very much interested. "Why that Mr. Mervyn, that's stopping at the Phoenix. A. Mervyn—I saw it on his dressing case. See how she smiles."

"Ay, she simpers like a firmity kettle," said scornful Miss Mag.

"They're very grand to-day, the Chatterworth, with them two livery footmen behind them," threw in O'Flaherty, accommodating his remark to the spirit of his lady-love.

"That young buck's a man of consequence," Toole rattled on; "Miss does not smile on everybody."

"Ay, she looks as if butter would not melt in her mouth, but I warrant cheese won't choke her," Magnolia laughed out with angry eyes.

Magnolia's fat and highly painted parent—poor bragging, good-natured, cunning, foolish Mrs. Macnamara, the widow—joined, with a venomous wheeze, in the laugh.

Those who suppose that all this rancor was produced by mere feminine emulation and jealousy do these ladies of the ancient sept Macnamara foul wrong. Mrs. Mack, on the contrary, had a fat and genial soul of her own, and Magnolia was by no means a particularly ungenerous rival in the list of love. But Aunt Rebecca was hoitytoity upon the Macnamaras, whom she would never consent to more than half-know, seeing them with difficulty, often failing to see them altogether—though Magnolia's stature and activity did not always render that easy.

Everybody knew that Miss Rebecca Chatterworth ruled supreme at Belmont. With a docile old General and a niece so young, she had less resistance to encounter than, perhaps her ardent soul would have relished. Fortunately for the General it was only now and then that Aunt Becky took a whim to command the Royal Irish Artillery. She had other hobbies just as odd, though not quite so scandalous. It had struck her active mind that such of the ancient women of Chapelizod as were destitute of letters—mendicants and the like—should learn to read. Twice a week her "old women's school," under that energetic lady's presidency, brought together its muster-roll of rheumatism, paralysis, dim eyes, bothered ears, and invincible stupidity. Over the fire-place, in large black letters, was the legend, "BETTER LATE THAN NEVER;" and out came the horn-books and spectacles, and to it they went with their A-B ab, etc., and plenty of wheezing and coughing. Aunt Becky kept good fires, and served out a mess of bread and broth, along with some pungent ethics, to each of her hopeful old girls. In winter she further encouraged them with a flannel petticoat apiece, and there was besides a monthly dole. So that although after a year there was, perhaps, on the whole, no progress in learning, the affair wore a tolerably encouraging aspect; for the academy had increased in numbers, and two old fellows, liking the notion of the broth and the 6d. a month—one a barber, Will Potts, ruined by a shake in his right hand, the other a drunken pensioner, Phil Doolan, with a wooden leg—petitioned to be enrolled, and were, accordingly, admitted. Some people said she was a bit of a Voltairian, but unjustly; for though she now and then came out with a bouncing social paradox, she was a good bitter Churchwoman. So she was liberal and troublesome—off-handed and dictatorial—not without good nature, but administering her benevolences somewhat tyrannically, and, for the most part, doing more or less of positive mischief in the process.

And now the General ("old Chatterworth," as the scornful Magnolia called him), drew near, with his benevolent smirk, and his stiff bows, and all his good-natured formalities—for the General had no notion of ignoring his good friend and officer, Major O'Neil, or his sister or niece—and so he made up to Mrs. Macnamara, who arrested a narrative in which she was demonstrating to O'Flaherty the General's lineal descent from old Chatterworth—an army tailor in Queen Anne's time—and his cousinship to a live butter dealer in Cork—and spicing her little history with not a very nice epigram on his uncle, "the counsellor," by Dr. Swift.

The good Mrs. Mack received the General haughtily and slightly, and Miss Magnolia with a short courtesy and a little toss of her head, and up went her fan, and she gigled something in Toole's ear, who grinned, and glanced uneasily out of the corner of his shrewd little eye at the unsuspecting General and on to Aunt Rebecca; for it was very important to Dr. Toole to stand well at Belmont. So, seeing that Miss Mag was disposed to be vicious, and not caring to be compromised by her tricks, he whistled and bawled to his dogs, and with a jolly smirk and flourished of his cocked-hat, off he went to seek other adventures.

Thus, was there feud and malice between two houses, and Aunt Rebecca's wrong-headed freak of cutting the Macnamaras [for it was not "snobbery," and she would talk for hours on band-days publicly and familiarly with scrubby little Mrs. Toole], involved her innocent relations in scorn and ill-will; for this sort of offence, like Chinese treason, is not visited on the arch offender only, but accordingly to a scale of consanguinity, upon his kith and kin. The criminal is minced—his sons hashed—his nephews reduced to outlets—his cousins to joints—and so on—none of the family quite escapes; and seeing the bitter reprisals provoked by this kind of uncharity, Christian people will, on the whole, do wisely to forbear practising it.

As handsome, slender Captain Devereux, with his dark face, and great, strange, earnest eyes, and that look of intelligence so racy and peculiar, that gave him a sort of enigmatical interest, stepped into the fair-green the dark blue glance of poor Nan Glynn, of Palmerston, from under her red, Sunday riding-hood, followed the tall, dashing, graceful apparition, with a stolen glance of wild loyalty and admiration. Poor Nan! with thy fun and thy rascalities, thy strong affection and thy fatal gift of beauty, where does thy head rest now?

Handsome Captain Devereux!—Gipsy Devereux, as they called him for his clear dark complexion—was talking a few minutes later to Lillias Walsingham. Oh, pretty Lillias—oh, true lady—I never saw the pleasant crayon sketch that my mother used to speak of, but the tradition of thee has come to me; so bright and tender, with its rose and violet tints, and merry, melancholy dimples, that I see thee now, as then, with the dew of thy youth still on thee, and sigh as I look, as if on a lost, early love of mine.

"I'm out of conceit with myself," he said; "I'm so idle and useless; I wish that were all—I wish myself better, but I'm such a weak coxcomb—a father-confessor might keep me nearer to my duty—some one to scold and exhort me. Perhaps some charitable lady would take me in hands, something might be made of me still."

There was a vein of seriousness in this reverie which amused the young lady ; for she had never heard any thing worse of him than that he had played once or twice rather high.

" Shall ask Gertrude Chatterworth to speak to her Aunt Rebecca ?" said Lillias slyly. " Suppose you attend her school in Martin's-row ; there are two pupils of your own sex, you know, and you might sit on the bench with poor Potts and good old Doolan."

" Thank you, Miss Lillias," he answered, with a bow and a little laugh, " I know she would do it zealously ; but neither so well nor so wisely as others might ; I wish I dare ask you to lecture me."

" I !" said the young lady—just a shade graver. " Oh, yes, I forgot," she went on merrily, " five years ago, when I was a little girl, you once called me Dr. Walsingham's curate, I was so grave—do you remember ?"

She did not know how much obliged Devereux was to her for remembering that poor little joke ; and how much the handsome lieutenant would have given, at that instant, to kiss the hand of the grave little girl of five years ago.

" I was a more impudent fellow then," he said, " than I am now ; won't you forget my old impertinences, and allow me to make atonement, and be your—your very humble servant now ?"

She laughed. " Not my servant—but you know I can't help you being my parishioner."

" And as such surely I may plead an humble right to your counsels and reproof. Yes, you shall lecture me—I'll bear it from none but you, and the more you do it, the happier at least, you make me," he said.

"Alas, if my censure is pleasant to you, 'tis a certain sign it can do you no good."

"It shall do me good, and be it never so bitter and so true, it will be pleasant to me too," he answered, with an honest and very peculiar light in his dark, strange eyes; and after a little pause, "I'll tell you why, just because I had rather you remembered my faults, than that you did not remember me at all."

"But 'tis not my business to make people angry."

"More likely you should make me sad, or perhaps happy that is to say, better. I think you'd like to see your parish improve."

"So I would, but by means of my example, not my preaching. No; I leave that to wiser heads—to the rector, for instance," and she drew closer to the dear old man, with a quick fond glance of such proud affection, for she thought the sun never shone upon his like, as made Devereux sigh a little unconscious sigh. The old man did not hear her—he was too absorbed in his talk—he only felt the pressure of his darling's little hand, and returned it, with a gentle squeeze of his cassocked arm, while he continued the learned essay he was addressing to young, queer, erudite, simple Dan Loftus, on the descent of the Decies branch of the Desmonds. Devereux was secretly chafed at the sort of invisible, but insuperable resistance which pretty Lilius Walsingham, as it seemed, unconsciously opposed to his approaches to a nearer and tenderer sort of trifling. "The little Siren; there are air-drawn circles round her which I cannot pass, and why should I? How is it that she interests me, and yet repels me so easily? And—and when I came here first," he continued aloud, "you were, oh dear, how mere a child, hardly eleven years old. How long I've known you, Miss Lilius, and yet how formal you are with me." There was reproach almost fierce in his eye, though his tones were low and gentle. "Well!" he said, with an odd changed little laugh, "you did commit yourself at first; you spoke against card-playing, and I tell you frankly I mean to play a great deal higher than I've ever done before, and so adieu "

He did not choose to see the little motion which indicated that she was going to shake hands with him, and only bowed the lower, and answered her grave smile, which seemed to say, "Now you are vexed," with another little laugh, and turned gaily away, and so was gone.

The Chatterworths by this time, as well as others, were moving away, and that young Mr. Mervyn, more remarked upon than he suspected, walked with them to the gate of the Fair Green. As he passed he bowed low to good parson Walsingham, who returned his salute, not unkindly—that never was—but very gravely and with his gentle and thoughtful blue eyes followed the party sadly on their way.

"Ay, there goes Mervyn! Well! so—so—pray heaven, sorrow and a blight follow him not into this place." The rector murmured to himself, and sighed, still following him with his glance.

---

CHAPTER V.

HOW THE ROYAL IRISH ARTILLERY ENTERTAINED SOME OF THE NEIGHBORS AT DINNER.

If I stuck at a fib as little as some historians, I might easily tell you who won the prizes at this shooting on Palmerstown Green. But the truth is I don't know; my granduncle could have told me, for he had a marvellous memory, but he died a pleasant old gentleman of four-score and upwards when I was a small urchin. Well it can't be helped now, and the papers I've got are silent upon the point. But there were jollifications to no end both in Palmerstown and Chapelizod that night, and declamatory conversation rising up in the street at very late hours, and singing and "hurrooing" along the moonlit roads.

There was a large and pleasant dinner-party, too, in the mess-room of the Royal Irish Artillery. Lord Castlemallard was there in the place of honor, next to jolly old General Chatterworth, and the worthy rector, Doctor Walsingham, and Father Roach, the dapper, florid little priest of the parish, with his keen relish for funny stories, side-dishes, and a convivial glass; and Dan Loftus, that simple, meek, semi-barbarous young scholar, his head in a state of chronic dishevelment, his harmless little round light-blue eyes, pinkish from late night-reading, generally betraying the absence of his vagrant thoughts, and I know not what of goodness, as well as queerness, in his homely features.

Good Dr. Walsingham, indeed, in his simple benevolence, had helped the strange, kindly creature through college, and had a high opinion of him, and a great delight in his company. They were both much given to books, and according to their lights zealous archæologists. They had got hold of Chapelizod Castle, a good tough enigma. Loftus had already two folios of extracts copied from all the records to which Doctor Walsingham could procure him access. They could not have worked harder, indeed, if they were getting up evidence to prove their joint title to Lord Castlemallard's estates. Loftus, moreover, was a good Irish scholar, and from Celtic MSS. had elicited some cross-lights upon his subject—not very bright or steady, I allow—but enough to delight the rector, and inspire him with a tender reverence for the indefatigable and versatile youth.

Lord Castlemallard was accustomed to be listened to, and was not aware how confoundedly dull his talk sometimes was. It was measured, and dreamy, and every way slow. He was entertaining the courteous old General at the head of the table, with an oration in laudem of Paul Dangerfield—a wonderful man, immensely wealthy, the cleverest man of this age; he might have been anything he pleased. His lordship really believed his English property would drop to pieces if Dangerfield retired from its management, and he was vastly obliged to him inwardly, for retaining the agency even for a little time longer. He was coming over to visit the Irish estates, perhaps to give Nutter a wrinkle or two. He was a bachelor; and his lordship averred would be a prodigious great match for some of our Irish ladies. Chapelized would be his head-quarters while in Ireland. No, he was not sure—he rather thought he was not of the Thorley family; and so on, for a mighty long time. But though he tired them prodigiously, he contrived to evoke before their minds' eyes a very gigantic, though somewhat hazy figure, and a good deal stimulated the interest with which a new arrival was commonly looked for in that pleasant suburban village.

There is no knowing how long Lord Castlemallard might have prosed upon this theme, had he not been accidentally cut short, and himself laid fast asleep in his chair, without his or anybody else's intending it. For overhearing, during a short pause, in which he sipped some claret, Surgeon Sturk applying some very strong, and indeed, frightful language to a little pamphlet upon magnetism, a subject then making a stir, asked Dr. Walsingham his opinion upon the subject.

Now, Dr. Walsingham was a great reader of out-of-the-way lore, and retained it with a sometimes painful accuracy; and he forthwith began—

“There is, my Lord Castlemallard, a curious old tract of the learned Van Helmont, in which he says, as near as I can remember his words, that magnetism is a magical faculty, which lieth dormant in us by the opiate of primitive sin, and therefore, stands in need of an excitator—which excitator may be either good or evil; but is more frequently Satan himself, by reason of some previous oppignoration or compact with witches. The power, indeed, is in the witch, and not conferred by him; but this versipellous or Protean impostor—these are his words—will not suffer her to know that it is of her own natural endowment, though for the present charmed into somnolent inactivity by the narcotic of primitive sin.”

I verily believe that an honest plodding description of a perfectly comfortable bed, and of the process of going to sleep, would, judiciously administered soon after dinner, overpower the vivacity of any tranquil gentleman who loves a nap after that meal. In the Doctor's address and quotation there was so much about somnolency and narcotics, and lying dormant, and opiates, that my Lord Castlemallard's senses forsook him, and he lost, as you, my kind reader must, all the latter portion of the Doctor's lullaby.

“I'd give half I'm pothethed of, thir, and all my prothpecth in life,” lisped vehemently plump little Lieutenant Puddock, in one of those stage frenzies to which he was prone, “to be the firht Alecthander on the boardth.”

Between ourselves, Puddock was short and fat, very sentimental, and a little bit of a gourmet; his desk stuffed with amorous sonnets and receipts for side-dishes; he, always in love, and often in the kitchen, where, under the rose, he loved to direct the cooking of critical little plats, very good-natured, rather literal, very courteous, a chevallier, indeed, sans reproche. He had a profound faith in his genius for tragedy, but those who liked him best could not help thinking that his plump cheeks, round, little, light eyes, his lisp, and a certain lack-a-daisical, though solemn expression of surprise, which nature seemed to have fixed upon his countenance, were against his shining in that walk of the drama.

He was blessed, too, with a pleasant belief in his acceptance with the fair sex; but had a real one with his comrades, who knew his absurdities and virtues, and laughed at and loved him.

"But hang it, there 'th no uthe in doing things by halves. Melpomene's the most jealouth of the Muses. I tell you, if you stand well in her gratheth, by Jove, thir, you mutht give yourthelf up to her body and thoul. How the deuthe can a fellow that's out at drill at thicth in the morning, and all day with his head filled with tactieth and gunnery, have a chance againth geniuses, no doubt—vathly thuperior by nature"—(Puddock, the rogue, believed no such thing)—"but who devote themthelveth to the thtudy of the art in-cethantly, exclusively, and—and——"

"Be the powers, Mr. Puddock, if I had half your janius for play-acting," interrupted O'Flaherty, "nothing i'd keep me from the boards iv Smockalley playhouse—in cog., I mean of course. There's that wondherful little Mr. Garrick, why he's the talk of 'the three kingdoms as long as I can remember—an' making his thousand pounds a-week—coining, be gannies, an' he can't be much taller than you, for he's contemptably small."

"I'm the taller man of the two," said little Puddock haughtily, who had made inquiries, and claimed half an inch over Roscius, honestly, let us hope. "But this is building castles in the air; joking apart, however, I do confess I should dearly love—just for a maggot, to play two parts, Richard the Third and Tamerlane."

"Was not that the part you spoke that pathaytic speech out of for mé before dinner?"

"No; that was Justice Greedy," says Devereux.

"Ay, so it was, was it? that smothered his wife."

"With a pudding clout," persisted Devereux.

"No. With a—pooh!—a—you know—and stabbed him self," continued O'Flaherty.

"With a larding-pin—'tis written in good Italian."

"Augh, not at all—it isn't Italian, but English, I'm thinking of—a pilla, Puddock, yon know—the black rascal."

"Well, English or Italian, tragedy or comedy," said Devereux, who liked Puddock, and would not annoy him, and saw he was hurt by Othello's borrowing his properties from the kitchen; "I venture to say you were well entertained; and for my part, sir, there are some characters"—(in farce Puddock was really highly diverting)—"in which I prefer Puddock to any player I ever saw."

And so they talked stage-talk. Puddock lithping away, grand and garrulous; O Flaherty, the illiterate, blundering in with sincere applause; and Devereux sipping his claret and dropping a quiet saucy word now and again.

"I shall never forget Mrs. Cibber's countenanth in that last thene, you know, in the 'Orphan'—Monimia, you know, Devereux." And the table being by this time in high chat, and the chairs a little irregular, Puddock slipped off his, and addressing himself to Devereux and O'Flaherty, just to give them a notion of Mrs. Cibber, began, with a countenance the most wo-begone, and in a piping falsetto—

"When I am laid low i' the grave, and quite forgotten."

Monimia dies at the end of the speech—as the reader may not be aware; but when Puddock came to the line,

"When I am dead, as presently I shall be," all Mrs. Cibber's best points being still to come, the little lieutenant's heel caught in the edge of the carpet, as he sailed with an imaginary hoop on grandly backward, and in spite of a surprising flick-flack cut in the attempt to recover his equipoise down came the "orphan," together with a table load of spoons and plates, with a crash that stopt all conversation.

Lord Castlemallard waked up, with a loud snort, and a "hallo, gentlemen!"

"It's only poor dear Monimia, General," says Devereux with a melancholy gravity and a bow, in reply to a fiery and startled stare darted to the point by that gallant officer. —

"Hey—eh?" said his lordship, brightening up, and gazing glassily round with a wan smile; and I fancy he thought a lady had somehow introduced herself during his nap, and was pleased, for he admired the sex.

"If there's any recitation going on, I think it had better be for the benefit of the company," said the General, a little surly, and looking full upon the plump Monimia, who was arranging his frill and hair, and getting a little awkwardly into his place.

"And I think 'twould be no harm, Lieutenant Puddock, my dear," says Father Roach testily, for he had been frightened by the crash, "if you'd die a little aisier the next time."

Puddock began to apologize.

"Never mind," said the General, recovering, "let's fill our glasses—my Lord Castlemallard, they tell me this claret is a pretty wine."

"A very pretty wine," said my Lord.

"And suppose, my Lord, we ask these gentlemen to give us a song? I say, gentlemen, there are fine voices among you. Will some gentleman oblige the company with a song?"

"Mr. Loftus sings a very fine song, I'm told," said Captain Cluffe, with a wink at Father Roach.

"Ay," cried Roach, backing up the joke (a good old one, and not quite off the hooks), "Mr. Loftus sings, I'll take my davy—I've heard him!"

Loftus was shy, simple, and grotesque, and looked like a man who could not sing a note. So when he opened his eyes, looked round, and blushed, there was a general knocking of glasses, and a very flattering clamor for Mr. Loftus's song.

But when silence came, to the surprise of the company he submitted, though with manifest trepidation, and told them that he would sing as the company desired. It was a song from a good old writer upon fasting in Lent, and was, in fact, a reproof to all hypocrisy. Hereupon there was a great ringing of glasses, and a jolly round of laughter rose up in the cheer that followed the announcement. Father Roach looked queer and disconcerted, and shot a look of suspicion at Devereux, for poor Dan Loftus had, in truth, hit that divine straight in a very tender spot.

The fact is, Father Roach was, as Irish priests were sometimes then, a bit of a sportsman. He and Toole used occasionally to make mysterious excursions to the Dublin mountains. He had a couple of mighty good dogs, which he lent freely, being a good-natured fellow. He liked good living and jolly young fellows, and was popular among the officers who used to pop in freely enough at his reverence's green hall-door whenever they wanted a loan of his dogs, or to take counsel of the ghostly father (whose opinion was valued more highly even than Toole's) upon the case of a sick dog or a lame nag.

Well, one morning, only a few weeks before, Devereux and Toole together had looked in on some such business upon his reverence, a little suddenly, and found him eating a hare!—by all the gods, it was—hare-pie in the middle of Lent!

It was at breakfast. His dinner was the meal of an anchorite, and who would have guessed that these confounded sparks would have bounced into his little refectory at that hour of the morning. There was no room for equivocation; he had been caught in the very act of criminal conversation with the hare-pie. He rose with a spring, like a Jack-in-a-box, as they entered, and knife and fork in hand, and with shining chops, stared at them with an angry, bothered, and alarmed countenance, which increased their laughter. It was a good while before he obtained a hearing, such was the hilarity, so sustained the fire of ironical compliments, inquiries, and pleasantries, and the general uproar.

When he did, with hand uplifted, after the manner of a prisoner arraigned for murder, he pleaded "a dispensation" I suppose it was true, for he backed the allegation with several most religious oaths and imprecations, and explained how men were not always so strong as they looked; that he might, if he liked it, by permission of his bishop, eat meat at any meal in the day, and every day in the week; that his not doing so was a voluntary abstinence—not conscientious, only expedient—to prevent the "unreasonable remarks" of his parishoners (a roar of laughter); that he was perhaps, rightly served for not having publicly availed himself of his bishop's dispensation (renewed peals of merriment). By this foolish delicacy (more of that detestible horse-laughter), he had got himself into a false position: and so on, till the ad misericordiam peroration addressed to "Captain Devereux, dear," and "Toole, my honey." Well, they quizzed him unmercifully; they sat down and eat all that was left of the hare-pie, under his wistful ogle. They made him narrate minutely every circumstance connected with the smuggling of the game, and the illicit distillation for the mess. They never passed so pleasant a morning. Of course, he bound them over to eternal secrecy, and of course, as in all similar cases the vow was religiously observed; nothing was ever heard of it at the mess—oh, no—and Toole never gave a dramatic representation of the occurrence, heightened and embellished with all the little Doctor's genius for farce.

Shortly after this little surprise, I suppose by way of ratifying the secret treaty of silence, Father Roach gave the officers and Toole a grand Lent dinner of fish, with no less than nineteen different plats, baked, boiled, stewed, in fact, a very splendid feast; and Puddock talked of some of those dishes more than twenty years afterwards.

CHAPTER VI.

IN WHICH THE MINSTRELSY PROCEEDS.

No wonder, then, if Father Roach, when Loftus announced his song and its theme, was thoroughly uneasy, and would have given a good deal that he had not helped that simple youth into his difficulty. But things must now take their course. So amid a decorous silence, Dan Loftus lifted up his voice, and sang. He leaned back in his chair, and little more than the whites of his upturned eyes were visible; and beating time upon the table with one hand, claw-wise, and with two or three queer little trills and roulades, which reappeared with great precision in each verse, he delivered himself thus, in what I suspect was an old psalm tune:—

“Now Lent is come, let us refrain
From carnal creatures, quick or slain,
Let's fast and macerate the flesh,
Impound and keep it in distress.”

Here there came a wonderful unspeakable choaking sound, partly through the mouth, partly through the nose, from several of the officers; and old General Chatterworth, who was frowning hard upon his dessert plate, and making wonderful faces, cried, “Order, gentlemen,” in a stern but very tremulous tone. Lord Castlemallard was staring with a grave and dreamy curiosity at the songster, and neither he nor his Lordship heard the interruption, and on went the pleasant ditty; and as the musician regularly repeated the last two lines like a clerk in a piece of psalmody, the young wags, to save themselves from bursting outright joined in the solemn chorus, while verse after verse waxed more uproarious and hilarious, and gave a singular relief to Loftus's thin, high, quavering solo :—

‘For forty days, and then we shall
Have a replevin from this thrall,
By warrant good, that for this fast,
Will give us angels’ food at last.”

“ ‘Tis a good song,” murmured Doctor Walsingham in Lord Castlemallard’s ear—“ I know the verses well—the ingenious and pious Howel penned them in the reign of King James the First.”

“ Ha ! thank you, sir,” said his Lordship.

“ But to abstain from beef, hog, goose,
And let our appetites go loose
To lobsters, crabs, prawns, or such fish,
We do not fast, but feast in this.

“ Not to let down lamb, kid, or veal,
Hen, plover, turkey-cock, or teal
And eat botargo, caviar,
Anchovies, oysters and such fare. -

“ Or to forbear from flesh, fowl, fish,
And eat potatoes in a dish
Dona o’er with amber, or a mess
Of ringos in a Spanish dress,

“ Or to refrain from all high dishes,
But feed our thoughts with wanton wishes,
Making the soul, like a light wench,
Wear patches of concupiscence.

“ This is not to keep Lent aright,
But play the juggling hypocrite;
For we must starve the inward man,
And feed the outward too on bran.”

I believe no song was ever received with heartier bursts of laughter and applause. Puddock indeed was grave, being a good deal interested in the dishes sung by the poet. So, for the sake of its moral point, was Dr. Walsingham, who kept time with head and hand, murmuring “ true, true—good, sir, good,” from time to time.

But honest Father Roach was confoundedly put out by the performance. He sat with his blue double chin buried in his breast, his quick, little, angry, suspicious eyes peeping cornerwise, not knowing how to take what seemed to him like a deliberate conspiracy to roast him for the entertainment of the company. But it was only a gunpowder glare, swallowed in an instant in darkness, and down came the black portcullis of his scowl with a chop, while clearing his voice, he said, rising very erect and square from an unusually ceremonious bow—

"I don't know, Mr. Loftus, exactly what you mean by a 'ring-goat in a Spanish dress'" (the priest had just smuggled over a wonderful bit of ecclesiastical toggerie from Salamanca); "and—a—person wearing patches, you said of—of—patches of concupiscence, I think" (Father Roach's housekeeper unfortunately wore patches, though, it is right to add, she was altogether virtuous, and by no means young); "but I'm bound to suppose, by the amusement our friends seem to derive from it, sir, that a ring-goat, whatever it means, is a good joke as well as a good-natured one."

"But, by your leave, thir," emphatically interposed Puddock, on whose ear the ecclesiastic's blunder grated like a discord, "Mr. Loftuth thang nothing about a goat, though kid is not a bad thing; he said, 'ringoth,' meaning, I conclude, eringoeth, a delicioth pretherve or confection. Have you never eaten them, either pretherved or candied—a—why I—a—I happen to have a retheipt—a—and if you permit me, thir—I shall be very happy to thend the retheipt to your honth-keeper."

"You'll not like it, sir," said Devereux, mischievously, "but there really is a capital one—quite of another kind—a lanten dish—fish, you know Puddock—the one you described yesterday; but Mr. Loftus has, I think, a still better way."

"Have you, thir?" asked Puddock, who had a keen appetite for knowledge.

"I don't know, Captain Puddock," murmured Loftus, bewildered.

"What is it?" remarked his reverence, shortly.

"A roast roach," answered Puddock, looking quite innocently, full in that theologian's fiery face.

"Thank you," says Father Roach, with an expression of countenance which polite little Puddock did not in the least understand.

"And how do you roast him—we know Loftus's receipt," persisted Devereux, with remarkable cruelty.

"Jutht like a lump," said Puddock, briskly.

"And how is that?" inquired Devereux.

"Flay the lump—splat him—divide him," answered Puddock, with great volubility; "and cut each thide into two piethes; season with thalt, pepper, and nutmeg, and bathte with clarified butter; dish him with thlitheth of orangeth, barberrieth, grapeth, goothberrieth, and butter; and you will find that he eaths deliciouthly either with farced pain or gammon pain."

This rhapsody, delivered with the rapidity and emphasis of Puddock's earnest lisp, was accompanied with very general tokens of merriment from the company, and the priest, who half suspected him of having invented it, was on the point of falling foul of him, when Lord Castlemallard rose to take leave, and the general forthwith vacated the chair, and so the party broke up, fell into groups, and the greater part sauntered off to the Phoenix, where, in the club-room—they with less restraint, and some new recruits, carried on the pleasures of the evening, which pleasures, as will sometimes happen, ended in something rather serious.

---

CHAPTER VII.

SHOWING HOW TWO GENTLEMEN MAY MISUNDERSTAND ONE ANOTHER, WITHOUT ENABLING THE COMPANY TO UNDERSTAND THEIR QUARREL.

Loftus had by this time climbed to the savage lair of his garret, overstrewn with tattered papers and books; and Father Roach, in the sanctuary of his little parlor, was growling over the bones of a devilled turkey, and about to soothe his fretted soul in a generous libation of hot whiskey punch.

Dr. Toole, whom the young fellow found along with Nutter over the draught-board in the club-room, forsook his game to devour the story of Loftus's Lenten Hymn, and poor Father Roach's penance, rubbed his hands, and slapt his thigh and crowed and shouted with ecstasy. O'Flaherty, who called for punch, and was unfortunately prone to grow melancholy and pugnacious over his liquor, was now in a saturnine vein of sentiment, discoursing of the charms of his peerless mistress, the Lady Magnolia Macnamara. While he was descanting on the attributes of that bewitching "crature," Puddock, not two yards off, was describing, with scarcely less unction, the perfections of "pig roast with the hair on;" and the two made a medley like "The Roast Beef of Old England," and "The Last Rose of Summer," arranged in alternate stanzas. O'Flaherty suddenly stopped short, and said a little sternly to Lieutenant Puddock—

"Does it very much signify, sir, (or as O'Flaherty pronounced it 'sorr,') whether the animal has hair upon it or not?"

"Every thing, thir, in thith particular retheipt," answered Puddock, a little loftily.

"But," said Nutter, the same time winking to Puddock in token that O'Flaherty was just a little "hearty," and so to let him alone; "what signifies pig's hair, compared with human tresses?"

"Compared with human tresses?" interrupted O'Flaherty, with stern deliberation, and fixing his eyes steadily and rather unpleasantly.

"Ay, sir, and Miss Magnolia Macnamara has as rich a head of hair as you could wish to see," says Nutter thinking he was drawing him off very cleverly.

"As I could wish to see?" repeated O'Flaherty grimly.

"As you could desire to see," reiterated Nutter firmly, for he was not easily put down; and they looked for several seconds in silence a little menacingly, though puzzled, at one another.

But O'Flaherty, after a little pause, seemed to forget Nutter, and returned to his celestial theme.

"Be the powers, sir, that young leedy has the most beautiful dimple in her chin I ever set eyes on!"

"Have you ever put a marrowfat pea in it sir?" inquired Devereux, simply, with all the beautiful rashness of youth.

"No, sir," replied O'Flaherty, in a deep tone, and with a very dangerous glare; "and I'd like to see the man who, in my presence, id presume to take that libertee."

"What a glorious name Magnolia is!" interposed little Toole in great haste; for it was a practice among these worthies to avert quarrels by making timely little diversions; and it is wonderful, at a critical moment, what may be done by suddenly presenting a trifle; a pin's point will draw off innocuously, the accumulating electricity of a pair of bloated scowling thunder-clouds.

"It was her noble godmother, when the family resided at Castlemara, in the county of Roscommon, the Lady Carrick-o'-Gunnol, who conferred it," said O'Flaherty, grandly, "upon her goddaughter, as who had a better right—I say, who had a better right?" and he smote his hand upon the table, and looked round inviting contradiction. "My godmothers, in my baptism—that's catechism—and all the town of Chapelizod won't put that down—the Holy Church Catechism—while Hyacinth O'Flaherty, of Coolnaquirk, Lieutenant Fireworker, wears a sword."

"Nobly said, Lieutenant!" exclaims Toole, with a sly wink over his shoulder.

"And what about the leedy's neeme, sir?" demands the fireworker.

"By Jove, sir, it is quite true, Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol ~~was~~ her godmother;" and Toole ran off into the story of how that relationship was brought about; narrating it, however, with great caution and mildness, extracting all the satire, and giving it quite a dignified and creditable character, for the Lieutenant Fireworker smelt so confoundedly of powder that the little doctor, though he never flinched when occasion demanded, did not care to give him an open.

The fact was, that poor Magnolia's name came to her in no very gracious way. Young Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol was a bit of a wag, and was planting a magnolia—one of the first of those botanical rarities seen in Ireland—when good-natured, vaporing, vulgar Mrs. Macnamara's note, who wished to secure a Peeress for her daughter's spiritual guardian, arrived. Her ladyship pencilled on the back of the note, "Pray call the dear babe Magnolia," and forthwith forgot all about it. But Madame Macnamara was charmed, and with great smiles and much complacency, she told Lord Carrick-o-Gunniol all about it, just outside the grand jury-room where she met him during the assize week; and, being a man of a weak and considerate nature, rather kind, and very courteous—although his smile was very near exploding into a laugh, as he gave the good lady snuff out of his own box—he was yet very much concerned and vexed, and asked his lady, when he went home, how she could have induced old Mrs. Macnamara to give that absurd name to her poor infant: whereat her ladyship, who had not thought of it since, was highly diverted; and being assured that the babe was actually christened and past recovery, Magnolia Macnamara, laughed very merrily, and then ran out to look at her magnolia, which, by way of reprisal, he henceforth, notwithstanding her entreaties, always called her "Macnamara;" till, to her infinite delight, he came out with it, as sometimes happens, at a wrong time, and asked old Mac—a large, mild man—then extant, madame herself, nurse, infant Magnolia, and all, who had arrived at the castle, to walk out and see Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol's "Macnamara" and perceived not the slip, such is the force of habit, though the family stared, and Lady C. laughed in an uncalled-for way, at a sudden recollection of a tumble she once had, when a child, over a flower-bed; and broke out repeatedly, to my lord's chagrin and bewilderment, as they walked towards the exotic.

When Toole ended his little family anecdote, which, you may be sure, he took care to render as palatable to Magnolia's knight as possible, by not very scrupulous excisions and interpolations, he wound all up, without allowing an instant for criticism or question by saying briskly, though incoherently,

"And so, what do you say, Lieutenant, to a Walsh rabbit for supper?"

The Lieutenant nodded a stolid assent.

"Will you have one, Nutter?" cries Toole.

"No," said Nutter.

"And why not?" says Toole

"Why, I helieve Tom Rooke's song in praise of oysters," answered Nutter, "especially the verse—

"The youth will ne'er live to scratch a gray head,
On a supper who goes of Welsh rabbit to bed."

How came it to pass that Nutter hardly opened his lips this evening without instantaneously becoming the mark at which O'Flaherty directed his fiercest and most suspicious scowls? And now that I know the allusion which the pugnacious lieutenant apprehended, I cannot but admire the fatality with which a very serious misunderstanding was brought about.

"As to youths living to scratch gray heads or not, sir," said the young officer, in most menacing tones; "I don't see what concern persons of your age can have in that. But I'll take leave to tell you, sir, whether he be a 'youth,' as you say, or aged, as you are, who endayvors to make himself diverting at the expense of others, runs a murdering good risk, sir, of getting himself scratched where he'll like it least."

Little Nutter, though grave, and generally taciturn, had a spirit of his own, and no notion whatever of knocking under to a bully. It is true, he had not the faintest notion why he was singled out for the young gentleman's impertinence; but neither did he mean to inquire. His mahogany features darkened for a moment to logwood, and his eyes showed their whites fiercely.

"We are not accustomed, sir, in this part of the world, to your Connaught notions of politeness; we meet here for social—a—a—sociality, sir; and the long and the short of it is, young gentleman, if you don't change your key, you'll find two can play at that game—and—and, I tell you, sir, there will be wigs on the green, sir."

Here several voices interposed.

"Silence, gentlemen, and let me speak, or I'll assault him," bellowed O'Flaherty, who, to do him justice, at this moment looked capable of anything. "I believe, sir," he continued, addressing Nutter who confronted him like a little game-cock, "it is not usual for one gentleman who renders himself offensive to another to oblige him to proceed to the length of manually malthrating his person. It is, sir, for the purpose of avoiding ungentlemanlike noise and confusion, that one gentleman should request of another to suppose himself affronted in the manner, whatever it may be, most intolerable to his feelings, which request I now sir, teeke the libertee of preferring to you; and when you have engaged the services of a friend, I trust that Lieutenant Puddock, will, in consideration of my being an officer of the same honorable corps, a sthranger in this part of the counthry, and, above all, a gentleman who can show paydagree like himself (here a low bow to Puddock, who returned it); that Lieutenant Puddock will be so feelin' and so kind as to receive him on my behalf, and acting as my friend to manage all the particulars for settling, as easily as may be, this most unprovoked affair."

With which words he made another bow, and a pause of inquiry directed to Puddock, who replied—

"Thir, the duty ith, for many reathons, painful; but I—I can't refuthe, thir, and I acthept the trutht."

So O'Flaherty shook his hand, with another bow, bowed silently and loftily round the room, and disappeared, and a general buzz and clack of tongues arose.

"Mr. Nutter—a—I hope things may be settled pleasantly," said Puddock, looking as tall and weighty as he could; "at present I—a—that is, at the moment, I—a—don't quite see—[the fact is, he had not a notion what the deuce it was all about]—but your friend will find me—your friend—a—at my lodgings up to one o'clock to-night, if necessary."

And Puddock bowed grandly and sublimely to Nutter, and then magnificently to the company, and left the room.

There was a sort of a stun and a lull for several seconds. One or two countenances wore that stern and mysterious smile, which implies no hilarity, but a kind of reaction in presence of the astounding and the slightly horrible. There was a silence; the gentlemen kept their attitudes too, for some moments, and all eyes were directed toward the door. Then some turned to Charles Nutter, and then the momentary spell dissolved itself.

CHAPTER VIII.

RELATING HOW DOCTOR TOOLE AND CAPTAIN DEVEREUX
WENT ON A MOONLIGHT ERRAND.

NEARLY a dozen gentlemen broke out at once into voluble speech. Nutter was in a confounded passion; but being a man of few words, showed his wrath chiefly in his countenance, and stood with his back to the fire-place, with his chest thrown daringly out, sniffing the air in a state of high tension.

"None of the corps can represent you, Nutter, you know," said Captain Cluffe. "It may go hard enough with Puddock and O'Flaherty, as the matter stands; but, by Jove! if any of us appear on the other side, the General would make it a very serious business, indeed."

"Toole, can't you?" asked Devereux.

"Out of the question," answered he, shutting his eyes, with a frown, and shaking his head. "There's no man I'd do it sooner for, Nutter knows; but I can't—I've refused too often; besides, you'll want me professionally, you know; for Sturk must attend that Royal Hospital inquiry to-morrow all day—but, hang it, where's the difficulty? Isn't there?—pooh!—why there must be lots of fellows at hand. Just—a—just think for a minute."

"I don't care who," said Nutter, with dry ferocity, "so he can load a pistol."

"Well," said Toole, getting close up to Devereux, in a coaxing, under tone, "suppose we try Loftus."

"Dan Loftus!" ejaculated Devereux.

"Dan Loftus," repeated the little doctor, testily; "remember, it's just eleven o'clock. He's no great things, to be sure; but what better can we get?"

"Allons, done!" says Devereux, donning his cocked hat, with a shrug, and the least little bit of a satirical smile, and out hustled the doctor beside him.

"Where the deuce did that broganeer, O'Flaherty, come from?" said Cluffe, confidentially, to old Major O'Niell.

"A Connaughtman," answered the Major, with a grim smile, for he was himself of that province, and was, perhaps, a little bit proud of his countryman.

"Toole says he's well connected," pursued Cluffe; "but, by Jupiter! I never saw so mere a Teague; and the most cross grained devil of a cat-a-mountain."

"I could not quite understand why he fastened on Mr. Nutter," observed the Major, with a mild smile.

"I'll rid the town of him," rapped out Nutter, with an oath, leering at his own shoebuckle, and tapping the sole with asperity on the floor.

"If you are thinking of any unpleasant measures, gentlemen, I'd rather know nothing of them," said the sly, quiet, Major; "for the General has expressed a strong opinion about such affairs; and as 'tis past my bed-hour I'll wish you gentlemen, a good-night," and off went the Major.

"He's alive and stirring still," said Devereux, approaching the hall-door with a military nonchalance.

"Whisht!" says Toole, plucking him back by the sash; "we must not make a noise—the house is asleep. I'll manage it—leave it to me."

And he took up a handful of gravel, but not having got the range, he shied it all against old Tom Drought's bedroom window.

"Deuce take that old sneak," whispered Toole, vehemently, "he's always in the way; the last man in the town I'd have—but no matter:" and up went a pebble, better directed, for this time it went right through Loftus's window, and a pleasant little shower of broken glass jingled down into the street.

like a deliberate conspiracy to roast him for the entertainment of the company. But it was only a gunpowder glare, swallowed in an instant in darkness, and down came the black portcullis of his scowl with a chop, while clearing his voice, he said, rising very erect and square from an unusually ceremonious bow—

“ I don't know, Mr. Loftus, exactly what you mean by a ‘ ring-goat in a Spanish dress ’ ” (the priest had just smuggled over a wonderful bit of ecclesiastical toggerie from Salamanca); “ and—a—person wearing patches, you said of—of—patches of concupiscence, I think ” (Father Roach's housekeeper unfortunately wore patches, though, it is right to add, she was altogether virtuous, and by no means young); “ but I'm bound to suppose, by the amusement our friends seem to derive from it, sir, that a ring-goat, whatever it means, is a good joke as well as a good-natured one.”

“ But, by your leave, thir,” emphatically interposed Puddock, on whose ear the ecclesiastic's blunder grated like a discord, “ Mr. Loftuth thang nothing about a goat, though kid is not a bad thing; he said, ‘ ringoth,’ meaning, I conclude, eringoeth, a delicioth pretherve or confection. Have you never eaten them, either pretherved or candied—a—why I—a—I happen to have a retheipt—a—and if you permit me, thir—I shall be very happy to thend the retheipt to your houth-keeper.”

“ You'll not like it, sir,” said Devereux, mischievously, “ but there really is a capital one—quite of another kind—a lanten dish—fish, you know Puddock—the one you described yesterday; but Mr. Loftus has, I think, a still better way.”

“ Have you, thir ? ” asked Puddock, who had a keen appetite for knowledge.

“ I don't know, Captain Puddock,” murmured Loftus, bewildered.

“ What is it ? ” remarked his reverence, shortly.

"A roast roach," answered Puddock, looking quite innocently, full in that theologian's fiery face.

"Thank you," says Father Roach, with an expression of countenance which polite little Puddock did not in the least understand.

"And how do you roast him—we know Loftus's receipt," persisted Devereux, with remarkable cruelty.

"Jutht like a lump," said Puddock, briskly.

"And how is that?" inquired Devereux.

"Flay the lump—splat him—divide him," answered Puddock, with great volubility; "and cut each thide into two pietthes; season with thalt, pepper, and nutmeg, and bathte with clarified butter; dish him with thlitheth of orangeth, barberrieth, grapeth, goothberrieth, and butter; and you will find that he eaths deliciouthly either with forced pain or gammon pain."

This rhapsody, delivered with the rapidity and emphasis of Puddock's earnest lisp, was accompanied with very general tokens of merriment from the company, and the priest, who half suspected him of having invented it, was on the point of falling foul of him, when Lord Castlemallard rose to take leave, and the general forthwith vacated the chair, and so the party broke up, fell into groups, and the greater part sauntered off to the Phoenix, where, in the club-room—they with less restraint, and some new recruits, carried on the pleasures of the evening, which pleasures, as will sometimes happen, ended in something rather serious.

---

CHAPTER VII.

SHOWING HOW TWO GENTLEMEN MAY MISUNDERSTAND ONE ANOTHER, WITHOUT ENABLING THE COMPANY TO UNDERSTAND THEIR QUARREL.

LOFTUS had by this time climbed to the savage lair of his garret, overstrewn with tattered papers and books; and Father Roach, in the sanctuary of his little parlor, was growling over the bones of a devilled turkey, and about to soothe his fretted soul in a generous libation of hot whiskey punch.

Dr. Toole, whom the young fellow found along with Nutter over the draught-board in the club-room, forsook his game to devour the story of Loftus's Lenten Hymn, and poor Father Roach's penance, rubbed his hands, and slapt his thigh and crowed and shouted with ecstasy. O'Flaherty, who called for punch, and was unfortunately prone to grow melancholy and pugnacious over his liquor, was now in a saturnine vein of sentiment, discoursing of the charms of his peerless mistress, the Lady Magnolia Macnamara. While he was descanting on the attributes of that bewitching "crature," Puddock, not two yards off, was describing, with scarcely less unction, the perfections of "pig roast with the hair on;" and the two made a medley like "The Roast Beef of Old England," and "The Last Rose of Summer," arranged in alternate stanzas. O'Flaherty suddenly stopped short, and said a little sternly to Lieutenant Puddock—

"Does it very much signify, sir, (or as O'Flaherty pronounced it 'sorr,') whether the animal has hair upon it or not?"

"Every thing, thir, in thith particular retheipt," answered Puddock, a little loftily.

"But," said Nutter, the same time winking to Puddock in token that O'Flaherty was just a little "hearty," and so to let him alone; "what signifies pig's hair, compared with human tresses?"

"Compared with human tresses?" interrupted O'Flaherty, with stern deliberation, and fixing his eyes steadily and rather unpleasantly.

"Ay, sir, and Miss Magnolia Macnamara has as rich a head of hair as you could wish to see," says Nutter thinking he was drawing him off very cleverly.

"As I could wish to see?" repeated O'Flaherty grimly.

"As you could desire to see," reiterated Nutter firmly, for he was not easily put down; and they looked for several seconds in silence a little menacingly, though puzzled, at one another.

But O'Flaherty, after a little pause, seemed to forget Nutter, and returned to his celestial theme.

"Be the powers, sir, that young leedy has the most beautiful dimple in her chin I ever set eyes on!"

"Have you ever put a marrowfat pea in it sir?" inquired Devereux, simply, with all the beautiful rashness of youth.

"No, sir," replied O'Flaherty, in a deep tone, and with a very dangerous glare; "and I'd like to see the man who, in my presence, id presume to taeke that libertee."

"What a glorious name Magnolia is!" interposed little Toole in great haste; for it was a practice among these worthies to avert quarrels by making timely little diversions; and it is wonderful, at a critical moment, what may be done by suddenly presenting a trifle; a pin's point will draw off innocuously, the accumulating electricity of a pair of bloated scowling thunder-clouds.

"It was her noble godmother, when the family resided at Castlemara, in the county of Roscommon, the Lady Currick-o'-Gunnioi, who conferred it," said O'Flaherty, grandly, "upon her goddaughter, as who had a better right—I say, who had a better right?" and he smote his hand upon the table, and looked round inviting contradiction. "My godmothers, in my baptism—that's catechism—and all the town of Chapelizod won't put that down—the Holy Church Catechism—while Hyacinth O'Flaherty, of Coolnaquirk, Lieutenant Fireworker, wears a sword."

"Nobly said, Lieutenant!" exclaims Toole, with a sly wink over his shoulder.

"And what about the leedy's neeme, sir?" demands the fireworker.

"By Jove, sir, it is quite true, Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol was her godmother;" and Toole ran off into the story of how that relationship was brought about; narrating it, however, with great caution and mildness, extracting all the satire, and giving it quite a dignified and creditable character, for the Lieutenant Fireworker smelt so confoundedly of powder that the little doctor, though he never flinched when occasion demanded, did not care to give him an open.

The fact was, that poor Magnolia's name came to her in no very gracious way. Young Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol was a bit of a wag, and was planting a magnolia—one of the first of those botanical rarities seen in Ireland—when good-natured, vaporeing, vulgar Mrs. Macnamara's note, who wished to secure a Peeress for her daughter's spiritual guardian, arrived. Her ladyship pencilled on the back of the note, "Pray call the dear babe Magnolia," and forthwith forgot all about it. But Madame Macnamara was charmed, and with great smiles and much complacency, she told Lord Carrick-o-Gunniol all about it, just outside the grand jury-room where she met him during the assize week; and, being a man of a weak and considerate nature, rather kind, and very courteous—although his smile was very near exploding into a laugh, as he gave the good lady snuff out of his own box—he was yet very much concerned and vexed, and asked his lady, when he went home, how she could have induced old Mrs. Macnamara to give that absurd name to her poor infant: whereat her ladyship, who had not thought of it since, was highly diverted, and being assured that the babe was actually christened and past recovery, Magnolia Macnamara, laughed very merrily, and then ran out to look at her magnia, which, by way of reprisal, he henceforth, notwithstanding her entreaties, always called her "Macnamara;" till, to her infinite delight, he came out with it, as sometimes happens, at a wrong time, and asked old Mac—a large, mild man—then extant, madame herself, nurse, infant Magnolia, and all, who had arrived at the castle, to walk out and see Lady Carrick-o-Gunniol's "Macnamara" and perceived not the slip, such is the force of habit, though the family stared, and Lady C. laughed in an uncalled-for way, at a sudden recollection of a tumble she once had, when a child, over a flower-bed; and broke out repeatedly, to my lord's chagrin and bewilderment, as they walked towards the exotic.

When Toole ended his little family anecdote, which, you may be sure, he took care to render as palatable to Magnolia's knight as possible, by not very scrupulous excisions and interpolations, he wound all up, without allowing an instant for criticism or question by saying briskly, though incoherently,

"And so, what do you say, Lieutenant, to a Walsh rabbit for supper?"

The Lieutenant nodded a stolid assent.

"Will you have one, Nutter?" cries Toole.

"No," said Nutter.

"And why not?" says Toole

"Why, I believe Tom Rooke's song in praise of oysters," answered Nutter, "especially the verse—

"The youth will ne'er live to scratch a gray head,
On a supper who goes of Welsh rabbit to bed."

How came it to pass that Nutter hardly opened his lips this evening without instantaneously becoming the mark at which O'Flaherty directed his fiercest and most suspicious scowls? And now that I know the allusion which the pugnacious lieutenant apprehended, I cannot but admire the fatality with which a very serious misunderstanding was brought about.

"As to youths living to scratch gray heads or not, sir," said the young officer, in most menacing tones; "I don't see what concern persons of your age can have in that. But I'll take leave to tell you, sir, whether he be a 'youth,' as you say, or aged, as you are, who endayvors to make himself diverting at the expense of others, runs a murdering good risk, sir, of getting himself scratched where he'll like it least."

Little Nutter, though grave, and generally taciturn, had a spirit of his own, and no notion whatever of knocking under to a bully. It is true, he had not the faintest notion why he was singled out for the young gentleman's impertinence; but neither did he mean to inquire. His mahogany features darkened for a moment to logwood, and his eyes showed their whites fiercely.

"We are not accustomed, sir, in this part of the world, to your Connaught notions of politeness; we meet here for social—a—a—sociality, sir; and the long and the short of it is, young gentleman, if you don't change your key, you'll find two can play at that game—and—and, I tell you, sir, there will be wigs on the green, sir."

Here several voices interposed.

"Silence, gentlemen, and let me speak, or I'll assault him," bellowed O'Flaherty, who, to do him justice, at this moment looked capable of anything. "I believe, sir," he continued, addressing Nutter who confronted him like a little game-cock, "it is not usual for one gentleman who renders himself offensive to another to oblige him to proceed to the length of manually malthrating his person. It is, sir, for the purpose of avoiding ungentlemanlike noise and confusion, that one gentleman should request of another to suppose himself affronted in the manner, whatever it may be, most intolerable to his feelings, which request I now sir, teeke the libertee of preferring to you ; and when you have engaged the services of a friend, I trust that Lieutenant Puddock, will, in consideration of my being an officer of the same honorable corps, a sthranger in this part of the counthry, and, above all, a gentleman who can show paydagree like himself (here a low bow to Puddock, who returned it) ; that Lieutenant Puddock will be so feelin' and so kind as to receive him on my behalf, and acting as my friend to manage all the particulars for settling, as easily as may be, this most unprovoked affair."

With which words he made another bow, and a pause of inquiry directed to Puddock, who replied—

"Thir, the duty ith, for many reathons, painful ; but I—I can't refuthe, thir, and I acthept the trutht."

So O'Flaherty shook his hand, with another bow, bowed silently and loftily round the room, and disappeared, and a general buzz and clack of tongues arose.

" Mr. Nutter—a—I hope things may be settled pleasantly," said Puddock, looking as tall and weighty as he could ; " at present I—a—that is, at the moment, I—a—don't quite see—[the fact is, he had not a notion what the deuce it was all about]—but your friend will find me—your friend—a—at my lodgings up to one o'clock to-night, if necessary."

And Puddock bowed grandly and sublimely to Nutter, and then magnificently to the company, and left the room.

There was a sort of a stun and a lull for several seconds. One or two countenances wore that stern and mysterious smile, which implies no hilarity, but a kind of reaction in presence of the astounding and the slightly horrible. There was a silence ; the gentlemen kept their attitudes too, for some moments, and all eyes were directed toward the door. Then some turned to Charles Nutter, and then the momentary spell dissolved itself.

CHAPTER VIII.

RELATING HOW DOCTOR TOOLE AND CAPTAIN DEVEREUX
WENT ON A MOONLIGHT ERRAND.

NEARLY a dozen gentlemen broke out at once into voluble speech. Nutter was in a confounded passion; but being a man of few words, showed his wrath chiefly in his countenance, and stood with his back to the fire-place, with his chest thrown daringly out, sniffing the air in a state of high tension.

"None of the corps can represent you, Nutter, you know," said Captain Cluffe. "It may go hard enough with Puddock and O'Flaherty, as the matter stands; but, by Jove! if any of us appear on the other side, the General would make it a very serious business, indeed."

"Toole, can't you?" asked Devereux.

"Out of the question," answered he, shutting his eyes, with a frown, and shaking his head. "There's no man I'd do it sooner for, Nutter knows; but I can't—I've refused too often; besides, you'll want me professionally, you know; for Sturk must attend that Royal Hospital inquiry to-morrow all day—but, hang it, where's the difficulty? Isn't there?—pooh!—why there must be lots of fellows at hand. Just—a—just think for a minute."

"I don't care who," said Nutter, with dry ferocity, "so he can load a pistol."

"Well," said Toole, getting close up to Devereux, in a coaxing, under tone, "suppose we try Loftus."

"Dan Loftus!" ejaculated Devereux.

"Dan Loftus," repeated the little doctor, testily; "remember, it's just eleven o'clock. He's no great things, to be sure; but what better can we get?"

"Allons, done!" says Devereux, donning his cocked hat, with a shrug, and the least little bit of a satirical smile, and out hustled the doctor beside him.

"Where the deuce did that broganeer, O'Flaherty, come from?" said Cluffe, confidentially, to old Major O'Niell.

"A Connaughtman," answered the Major, with a grim smile, for he was himself of that province, and was, perhaps, a little bit proud of his countryman.

"Toole says he's well connected," pursued Cluffe; "but, by Jupiter! I never saw so mere a Teague; and the most cross grained devil of a cat-a-mountain."

"I could not quite understand why he fastened on Mr. Nutter," observed the Major, with a mild smile.

"I'll rid the town of him," rapped out Nutter, with an oath, leering at his own shoebuckle, and tapping the sole with asperity on the floor.

"If you are thinking of any unpleasant measures, gentlemen, I'd rather know nothing of them," said the sly, quiet, Major; "for the General has expressed a strong opinion about such affairs; and as 'tis past my bed-hour I'll wish you gentlemen, a good-night," and off went the Major.

"He's alive and stirring still," said Devereux, approaching the hall-door with a military nonchalance.

"Whisht!" says Toole, plucking him back by the sash; "we must not make a noise—the house is asleep. I'll manage it—leave it to me."

And he took up a handful of gravel, but not having got the range, he shied it all against old Tom Drought's bedroom window.

"Deuce take that old sneak," whispered Toole, vehemently, "he's always in the way; the last man in the town I'd have—but no matter:" and up went a pebble, better directed, for this time it went right through Loftus's window, and a pleasant little shower of broken glass jingled down into the street.

"Loftus, we want you," said Toole, in a hard whispered shout, and making a speaking-trumpet of his hands, as the wild head of the student, like nothing in life but a hen's nest, appeared above.

"Cock-Loftus, come down, d'ye hear?" urged Devereux.

"Dr. Toole and Lieutenant Devereux—I—I—dear me! yes. Gentlemen, your most obedient," murmured Loftus, vacantly, and knocking his head smartly on the top of the window-frame, in recovering from a little bow. "I'll be wi' ye, gentlemen, in a moment."

Toole and Devereux drew back a little into the shadow of the opposite buildings, for while they were waiting, a dusky apparition, supposed to be old Drought in his night-shirt, appeared at that gentleman's windows, saluting the ambassadors with mop and moe in a very threatening and energetic way. Just as this demonstration subsided, the hall-door opened wide—and indeed was left so—while our friend Loftus, in a wonderful tattered old silk coat, that looked quite indescribable by moonlight, the torn linings hanging down in loops inside the skirts; his shirt loose at the neck, his breeches unbuttoned at the knees, and a pair of slippers clinging and clattering about his feet, came down the steps, his light, round little eyes and queer quiet face peering at them into the shade, and a smokified volume of divinity tucked under his arm, with his finger between the leaves to keep the place.

When Devereux saw him approaching, the whole thing—mission, service, man, and all—struck him in so absurd a point of view, that he burst out into an explosion of laughter, which only grew more vehement and uproarious the more earnestly and imploringly Toole tried to quiet him. But the young gentleman was not in the habit of denying himself innocent indulgences, and shaking himself loose of Toole, he walked down the dark side of the street in peals of laughter, making, ever and anon, little breathless remarks to himself, which his colleague could not hear, and left the doctor to himself, to conduct the negotiation with Loftus.

"Well?" said Devereux, by this time recovering breath, as the little doctor, looking very red and glum, strutted up to him along the shady pavement.

"Well? well?—oh, ay, very well, to be sure. I'd like to know what the plague we're to do now," grumbled Toole.

"Your precious armour-bearer refuses to act, then?" asked Devereux.

"To be sure he does. He sees you walking down the street, ready to die o' laughing—at nothing, by Jove!" answers Toole, in deep disgust; "and—and—oo! hang it! it's all a confounded pack o' nonsense. Sir, if you could not keep grave for five minutes, you ought not to have come at all. But what need I care? It's Nutter's affair, not mine."

"And well for him we failed. Did you ever see such a fish? He'd have shot himself or Nutter, to a certainty. But there's a chance yet: we forgot the Nightingale Club; they're still in the Phoenix."

"Pooh, sir! they're all tailors and green-grocers," said Toole, in high dudgeon.

"There are two or three good names among them, however," answered Devereux; and by this time they were on the threshold of the Phoenix.

"Larry," he cried to the waiter, "the Nightingale Club is there, is not it?" glancing at the great back parlor-door.

"Be the powers! Captain, you may say that," says Larry, with a wink, and a grin of exquisite glee.

"See, Larry," said Toole, with importance, "we're a little serious now; so just say if there's any of the gentlemen there; you—you understand, now; quite steady? D'ye see me?"

Larry winked—this time a grave wink—looked down at the floor, and up to the cornice, and—

"Well," says he, "to be candid with you, jest at this minute—half an-hour ago, you see, it was different—the only gentleman I'd take on myself to recommend to you as perfectly sober is Mr. Macan, of Petticoat-lane."

"Does he keep a shop?" said Devereux.

"A shop! two shops;—a great man in the chandlery line," responded Larry.

"H'm! not precisely the thing we want, though," says Toole.

"There are some of them, surely, that don't keep shops," said Devereux, a little impatiently.

"Millions," said Larry.

"Come, say their names.

"Only one of them came this evening, Mr. Doolan of Stoneybatther—he's a retired merchant."

"That will do," said Toole, under his breath, to Devereux. Devereux nodded.

"Just, I say, tap him on the shoulder, and tell him that Dr. Toole, you know, of this town, with many compliments and excuses, begs one word with him," said the doctor.

"Hoo! Docthur dear, he was the first of them down, and was carried out to his coach insensible jist when Mr. Crozier of Christ Church began, 'Come Roger and listen;' he's in his bed in Stoneybatther a good hour and a half ago."

"A retired merchant," says Devereux; "well, Toole, what do you advise, now?"

"By Jove, I think one of us must go into town. 'Twill never do to leave poor Nutter in the lurch; and between that O'Flaherty's a—a blood-thirsty idiot, by Jove—and ought to be put down."

"Let's see Nutter—you or I must go—we'll take one of these songster's "noddies."

[A "noddy," give me leave to remark, was the one-horse hack vehicle of Dublin and the country round, which has since given place to the jaunting car, which is, in its turn, half superseded by the cab.]

And Devereux, followed by Toole, entered the front parlor again. But without their help the matter was arranging itself, and a second, of whom they knew nothing, was about to emerge.

---

CHAPTER IX.

HOW A SQUIRE WAS FOUND FOR THE KNIGHT OF THE RUEFUL COUNTENANCE.

WHEN Dr. Toole grumbled at his disappointment, he was not at all aware how nearly his interview with Loftus had knocked the entire affair on the head. He had no idea how much that worthy person was horrified by his proposition; and Toole walked off in a huff, without bidding him good night, and making a remark, in which the words "old woman" occurred pretty audibly. But Loftus remained under the glimpses of the moon in perturbation and sore perplexity. It was so late he scarcely dared disturb Dr. Walsingham or General Chatterworth. But there came the half-stifled cadence of a song—not bacchanalian, but sentimental—something about Daphne and a swain—struggling through the window-shutters next the green hall-door close by, and Dan instantly bethought him of Father Roach. So knocking stoutly at the window, he caused the melody to subside and the shutter to open. When the priest, looking out, saw Dan Loftus in his dishabille, I believe he thought for a moment it was something from the neighboring church-yard.

However, his reverence came out and stood on the steps, enveloped in a hospitable aroma of broiled bones, lemons, and alcohol, and shaking his visitor affectionately by the hand—for he bore no malice, and the Lenten ditty he quite forgave as being no worse in modern parlance than an unhappy "flake"—was about to pull him into the parlor, where there was ensconced, he told him, "a noble friend of his." This was "Pat Mahony, from beyond Killarney, just arrived—a man of parts, and conversation, and a lovely singer."

But Dan resisted, and told his tale in an earnest whisper in the hall. The priest made his mouth into a round queer little O, through which he sucked a long breath, elevating his brows, and rolling his eyes slowly about.

"A jewel! And Nutter, of all the men on the face of the airth—though I often heard he was a fine shot, and a sweet little fencer, in his youth, an' game, too—oh, be the powers! you can see that still—game to the back-bone—and—whisht a bit now—who's the other?"

"Lieutenant O'Flaherty."

(A low whistle from his reverence). "That's a boy that comes from a fighting county—Galway. I wish you saw them at an election time. Why, there's no end of divarsion—the divarsion of stopping them, of course, I mean (observing a sudden alteration in Loftus's countenance). An, you, av, coorse, want to stop it? And so, av coorse, do I, my dear. Well, then, wait a bit, now—we must have our eyes open. Don't be in a hurry—let us be harrumless as sar-pints, but wise as doves. Now, 'tis a fine thing, no doubt, to put an end to a jewel by active intherfarence; but take it that a jewel is breaking down and coming to the ground of itself in an aisy, natural, accomnodating way, the only effect of intherfarence is to bolster it up, d'ye see, so just considher how things are, my dear. Lave it all to me, and mind my words, it can't take place without a second. I defy it to come to anything. Jest be said be me, Dan Loftus, and let sleeping dogs lie. Go you to bed—lave them to me—and they're checkmated without so much as seeing how we bring it to pass."

Dan hesitated.

"Arrah! go to your bed, Dan Loftus, dear. It's past eleven o'clock—they're nonplussed already; and lave me—me that understands it—to manage the rest."

"Well, sir, I do confide it altogether to you. I know I might, through ignorance, do a mischief."

And so they bid a mutual good night, and Loftus scaled his garret stair and snuffed his candle, and plunged again into the business of two thousand years ago.

"Here's a purty business," says the priest, extending both his palms, with a face of warlike importance, and shutting the door behind him with what he called "a cow's kick;" "a jewel, my dear Pat, no less; bloody work I'm afeared."

Mr. Mahony, who had lighted a pipe during his entertainer's absence, withdrew the fragrant tube from his lips, and opened his capacious mouth with a look of pleasant expectation, for he, like other gentlemen of his day—regarded the ordeal of battle, and all its belongings, simply as the highest branch of sporting. Not that the worthy Father avowed any such sentiment; on the contrary, his voice and his eyes, if not his hands, were always raised against the sanguinary practice; and scarce a duel occurred within a reasonable distance unattended by his reverence, in the capacity, as he said, of "an unauthorized but airnest, though, he feared, unavailing peace-maker."

"Pat, my child," said his reverence, "that Nutter's a divil of a fellow—at least he was, by all accounts; he'll be bad enough I'm afeared, and hard enough to manage, if everything goes smooth; but if he's kept waiting there, fuming and boiling over, do ye mind, without a natural vent for his feelings, or a friend, do ye see, at his side to—to rasthrain him, and bring about, if possible, a friendly, mutual understanding—why, my dear child, he'll get into that state of exasperation an' violence, he'll have half a dozen jewels on his hands before morning."

"Augh! 'tid be a murther to baulk them for want of a friend," answered Mr. Mahony, standing up like a warrior, and laying the pipe of peace upon the chimney. "Will I go down, Father Denis, and offer my sarvices?"

"With a view to a reconciliation, mind," says, his reverence, raising his finger, closing his eyes, and shaking his florid face impressively.

'Och, bother! don't I know—of coorse. reconciliation;" and he was buttoning his garments where, being a little "in flesh," as well as tall, he had loosed them. "Where are the gentlemen now, and who will I ask for?"

"I'll show you the light from the steps. Ask for Dr. Toole; and he's certainly there; and if he's not, for Mr. Nutter: and just say you came from my house, where you—a—pooh! accidentally heard, through Mr. Loftus, do ye mind, there was a difficulty in finding a friend to—a—strive to make up matters between thim."

By this time they stood upon the door steps; and Mr. Mahony had clapt on his hat with a pugnacious cock o' one side; and followed the direction of the priest's hand, that indicated the open door of the Phœnix, through which a hospitable light was issuing.

"There's where you'll find the gentlemen, in the front parlor," says the priest. "You remember Dr. Toole, and he'll remember you. An' mind, dear, it's to make it up you're goin'." Mr. Mahony was already under weigh, at a brisk stride, and with a keen relish for the business. "And the blessing of the peace-maker go with you, my child!" added his reverence, lifting his hands and his eyes towards the heavens, "An' upon my fainy!" looking shrewdly at the stars, and talking to himself, "they'll have a fine morning for the business, if, unfortunately"—and here he re-ascended his door-steps with a melancholy shrug—"if, unfortunately, Pat Mahony should fail."

When Mr. Pat Mahony saw occasion for playing the gentleman, he certainly did come out remarkably strong in the part. Such bows, such pointing of the toes, such graceful flourishes of the three-cocked hat—such immensely engaging smiles and wonderful by-play, such an apparition, in short, of perfect elegance, valor, and courtesy, were never seen before in the front parlor of the Phoenix.

"Mr. Mahony, by jingo!" ejaculated Toole, in an accent of thankfulness amounting nearly to rapture. Nutter seemed relieved, too, and advanced to be presented to the man who, instinct told him, was to be his friend. Cluffe, a man of fashion of the military school, eyed the elegant stranger with undisguised disgust and wonder, and Devereux with that sub-acid smile with which men will sometimes quietly relish absurdity.

Having effected the introduction, and made known the object of his visit, Nutter and Mahony withdrew to a small chamber behind the bar, where Nutter, returning some of his bows, and having listened without deriving any very clear ideas to two consecutive addresses from his companion, took the matter in hand himself, and said he—

"I beg, sir, to relieve you at once from the trouble of trying to arrange this affair amicably. I have been grossly insulted, and nothing but a meeting will satisfy me. He's a mere murderer. I have not the faintest notion why he wants to kill me; but being reduced to this situation, I hold myself obliged, if I can, to rid the town of him finally."

"Shake hands, sir," cried Mahony, forgetting his rhetoric in his enthusiasm; "be the hole in the wall, sir, I honor you."

---

CHAPTER X.

THE DEAD SECRET, SHOWING HOW THE FIRE-WORKER
PROVED TO PUDDOCK THAT NUTTER HAD SPIED OUT THE NAKEDNESS OF THE LAND.

WHEN Puddock, having taken a short turn or two in the air, mounted his lodging stairs, he found Lieutenant O'Flaherty, not at all more sober than he had last seen him, in the front drawing-room, which apartment was richly perfumed with powerful exhalations of rum punch.

"Dhrink this, Puddock—dhrink it," said O'Flaherty, filling a large glass in equal quantities with rum and water; "dhrink it, my sinsare friend; it will studdy you, it will upon my honor, Puddock!"

"But—a—thank you, sir, I am anxious to understand exactly"—said Puddock. Here he was interrupted by a frightful grin and a "ha!" from O'Flaherty, who darted to the door, and seizing his little withered French servant, who was entering, swung him about the room by his coat collar.

"So sorr, you've been prating again, have you, you desateful, idle old dhrunken miscreant; you did it on purpose, you blundherin' old hyena; it's the third jewel you got your masther into; and if I lose my life, divil a penny iv your wages you'll ever get—that's one comfort. I dono' if it's malice, or only blundherin'. Oh!" he cried, with a still fiercer shake, "it's I that wishes I could be sure 'twas malice, I'd skiver you, heels and elbows, on my sword, and roast you alive on that fire. Is not it a hard thing, my darlin' Puddock, I can't find out. But I am always the sport of misfortunes—small and great. I could tell you, Puddock," he continued, forgetting his wrath, and letting his prisoner go, in his eager pathos—the Frenchman made his escape in a twinkling—"I was the only man in our regiment that tuck the mazles in Cork, when it was goin' among the children, bad luck to them—I that was near dyin' of it when I was an infant; and I was the only officer in the regiment, when we were at Athlone, that was prevented going to the race ball—and I would not for a hundred pounds. I was to dance the first minuet, and the first country dance, with that beautiful creature, Miss Rose Cox. I was makin' a glass of brandy punch—not feelin' quite myself—and I dhressed and all, in our room, when Ensign Higgins, a most thoughtless young man, said something disrespectful about a beautiful mole she had on her chin; bedad, sir, he called it a wart, if you plase! and feelin' it sthrongly, I let the jug of scaldin' wather drop on my knees; I wish you felt it, my darlin' Puddock. I was scalded in half a crack from a fut above my knees down to the last joint of my big toes; and I raly thought my sinses were laving me. I lost the ball by it. Oh, ho, wirresthrue! poor Hyacinth O'Flaherty!" and thereupon he wept.

"You thee, Lieutenant O'Flaherty," lisped Puddock, growing impatient, "we can't thay how thoon Mr. Nutter'th friend may apply for an interview, and—a—I mutht confeth I don't yet quite underthtand the point of differentht between you and him, and therefore"——

"A where the devil's that blackguard little French wazel gone to?" exclaimed O'Flaherty, for the first time perceiving that his captive had escaped. "Kokang Modate! Do you hear me, Kokang Modate!" he shouted.

"But really, thir, you mutht be so good ath to plathe before me, before me, thir, clearly, the—the canthe of thith unhappy dithpute, the exact offenth, thir, for otherwithe ”——

“Get out o’ that, sorr,” thundered O’Flaherty, with an awful stamp on the floor, as the “coquin maudit,” O’Flaherty’s only bit of French, such as it was, in obedience to that form of invocation, appeared nervously at the threshold, “or I’ll fling the contints of the r-r-o-oo-oom at your head, (exit monsieur, again). Be gannies ! if I thought it was he that done it I’d jirk his old bones through the top of the window. Will I call him back and give him his desarts, will I, Puddock !”

“I begin to dethpair, thir,” exclaimed Puddock, “of retheiving the information without which tith vain for me to try to be utheful to you ; on the more, may I entreat to know that ith the affront of which you complain ?”

“You don’t know ; raly and truly now, you don’t know ?” said O’Flaherty, fixing a solemn tipsy leer on him.

“I tell you no, thir,” rejoined Puddock.

“And do you mean to tell me you did not hear that vulgar dog Nutter’s unmanly jokes ?”

“Jokes !” repeated Puddock, in large perplexity, “why I have been here in this town for more than five years, and I never heard in all that time that Nutter once made a joke. —and upon my life, I don’t think he could make a joke if he tried—I don’t, indeed, Lieutenant O’Flaherty, upon my honor !”

“And rat it, sir, how can I help it ?” cried O’Flaherty relapsing into pathos.

“Help what ?” demanded Puddock.

O’Flaherty took him by the hand, and gazing in his face with a mauldin, lacklustre tenderness, said :

“I want to tell you, Puddock, dear, if you’ll only have a minute’s patience. This door can’t fasten, divil bother it ; come into the next room ;” and toppling a little in his walk, he led him solemnly into his bed room—the door of which he locked—somewhat to Puddock’s disquietude, who began to think him insane. Here having informed Puddock that Nutter was driving at one point the whole evening, as any one that knew the secret would have seen; and having solemnly imposed the seal of secrecy upon his second, and essayed a wild and broken discourse upon the difference between total baldness and partial loss of hair, he disclosed to him the grand mystery of his existence, by lifting from the summit of his head a circular piece of wig, which in those days they called, I believe, a "topping," leaving a bare shining dish exposed, about the size of a large pat of butter.

"Upon my life, thir, it'th a very fine piethe of work," says Puddock, who viewed the wiglet with the eye of a stage-property man, and held it by a top lock near the candle. "The very finetht piethe of work of the kind I ever thaw. 'Tith thertainly French. Oh, yeth—we can't do thuch thingth here. By Jove, thir, what a wig that man would make for Cato!"

"An' he must be a mane crature—I say, a mane crature," pursued O'Flaherty, "for there was not a soul in the town but Jerome, the—the threacherous ape, that knew it. It's he that dhresses my head every morning behind the bed-curtain there, with the door locked. And Nutter could never have found it out—who was to tell him, unlees that ojus French damon, that's never done talkin' about it;" and O'Flaherty strode heavily up and down the room with his hands in his breeches' pockets, muttering savage invectives.

"Come in, sorr!" thundered O'Flaherty, unlocking the door, in reply to a knock, and expecting to see his "ojus French damon." But it was a tall fattish stranger, rather flashily dressed, but a little soiled, with a black wig, and a rollicking red face, showing a good deal of chin and jaw.

O'Flaherty made his grandest bow, quite forgetting the exposure at the top of his head; and Puddock stood rather shooked, with the candle in one hand and O'Flaherty's scalp in the other.

"You come, sir, I presume, from Mr. Nutter," said O'Flaherty, with lofty courtesy. "This, sir, is my friend Lieutenant Puddock, of the Royal Irish Artillery, who does me the honor to support me with his advice and" —

As he moved his hand towards Puddock he saw his scalp dangling between that gentleman's finger and thumb, and became suddenly mute. He clapped his hand upon his bare skull, and made an agitated pluck at that article, but missed and disappeared, with an imprecation in Irish, behind the bed curtains.

"If you will be so obliging, sir, as to precede me into that room," lisped Puddock, with grave dignity, and waving O'Flaherty's scalp slightly toward the door—for Puddock never stooped to hide any thing, and being a gentleman, pure and simple, was not ashamed or afraid to avow his deeds, words, and situations; "I shall do myself the honor to follow."

"Gi' me that," was heard in a vehement whisper from behind the curtains. Puddock understood it, and restored the treasure.

The secret conference in the drawing-room was not tedious nor indeed very secret, for any one acquainted with the diplomatic slang in which such affairs were conducted might have learned in the lobby, or indeed in the hall, so mighty was the voice of the stranger, that there was no chance of any settlement without a meeting which was fixed to take place at twelve o'clock next day on the Fifteen Acres.

---

CHAPTER XI.

SOME TALK ABOUT THE HAUNTED HOUSE—BEING, AS I SUPPOSE, ONLY OLD WOMEN'S TALES.

OLD SALLY always attended her young mistress while she prepared for bed—not that Lillias required help, for she had the spirit of neatness and a joyous, gentle alacrity, and only troubled the good old creature enough to prevent her thinking herself grown old and useless.

Sally, in her quiet way, was garrulous, and she had all sorts of old-world tales of wonder and adventure, to which Liliás often went pleasantly to sleep ; for there was no danger while old Sally sat knitting there by the fire, and the sound of the rector's mounting upon his chairs, as was his wont, and taking down and putting up his books in the study beneath, though muffled and faint, gave evidence that that good and loving influence was awake and busy:

Old Sally was telling her young mistress, who sometimes listened with a smile, and sometimes lost a good five minutes together of her gentle prattle, how the young gentleman, Mr. Mervyn, had taken that awful old haunted habitation, the Tiled House "beyant at Ballyfermot," and was going to stay there, and wondered no one had told him of the mysterious dangers of that desolate mansion.

It stood by a lonely bend of the narrow road. Liliás had often looked upon the short, straight, grass-grown avenue with an awful curiosity at the old house which she had learned in childhood to fear as the abode of shadowy tenants and unearthly dangers.

"There are people, Sally, now-a-days, who call themselves free-thinkers, and don't believe in anything—even in ghosts," said Liliás.

"A then the place he's stopping in now, Miss Lily, 'ill soon cure him of free-thinking, if the half they say about it's true," answered Sally.

"But I don't say, mind, he's a free-thinker, for I don't know anything of Mr. Mervyn ; but if he be not, he must be very brave, or very good, indeed. I know, Sally, I should be horribly afraid, indeed, to sleep in it myself," answered Liliás, with a cosey little shudder. "And now, Sally, I'm safe in bed. Stir the fire, my old darling." For although it was the first week in May, the night was frosty. "And tell me all about the Tiled House again, and frighten me out of my wits."

So good old Sally, whose faith in such matters was a religion, went off over the well-known ground in a gentle little amble—sometimes subsiding into a walk as she approached some special horror, and pulling up altogether—that is to say, suspending her knitting, and looking with a mysterious nod at her young mistress in the fourposter, or lowering her voice to a sort of whisper when the crisis came.

So she told her how when the neighbors hired the orchard that ran up to the windows at the back of the house, the dogs they kept then used to howl so wildly and wolfishly all night among the trees, and prowl under the walls of the house so dejectedly, that they were fain to open the door and let them in at last; and, indeed, small need was there for dogs; for no one, young or old, dared go near the orchard after night-fall. And this was no fanciful reserve and avoidance. Mick Daly, when he had the orchard, used to sleep in the loft over the kitchen; and he swore that within five or six weeks, while he lodged there, he twice saw the same thing, and that was a lady in a hood and a loose dress, her head drooping, and her finger on her lip, walking in silence among the crooked stems, with a little child by the hand, who ran smiling and skipping beside her. And the Widow Cresswell once met them at night-fall, on the path through the orchard to the back-door, and she did not know what it was until she saw the men looking at one another as she told it.

"It's often she told it to me," said old Sally; "and how she came on them all of a sudden at the turn of the path, just by the thick clump of alder trees; and how she stopped, thinking it was some lady that had a right to be there; and how they went by as swift as the shadow of a cloud, though she only seemed to be walking slow enough, and the little-child pulling by her arm, this way and that way, and took no notice of her, nor even raised her head, though she stopped and curtsied. And old Clinton, don't you remember old Dalton, Miss Lily?"

"I think I do, the old man who limped, and wore the odd black wig?"

"Yes, indeed, acushla, so he did. See how well she remembers! That was by a kick of one of the earl's horses—he was groom there," resumed Sally. "He used to be troubled with hearing the very sounds his master used to make to bring him and old Oliver to the door, when he came back late. It was only on very dark nights when there was no moon. They used to hear all on a sudden, the whimpering and scraping of dogs at the hall-door, and the sound of the whistle, and the light stroke across the window with the lash of the whip, just like as if the earl himself—may his poor soul find rest—was there. First the wind 'id stop, like you'd be holding your breath, then came these sounds they knew so well, and when they made no sign of stirring or opening the door, the wind 'id begin again with such a hoo-hoo-o-o-high, you'd think it was laughing, and crying, and hooting all at once.

"The very night he met his death in England, old Oliver, the butler, was listening to Dalton—for Dalton was a scholar—reading the letter that came to him through the post that day, telling him to get things ready, for his troubles wor nearly over, and he expected to be with them again in a few days, and may be almost as soon as the letter; and sure enough, while he was reading, there comes a frightful rattle at the window, like some one all in a tremble, trying to shake it open, and the earl's voice, as they both conceited, cries from outside, 'Let me in, let me in, let me in!' 'It's him,' says the butler. 'Tis so, bedad,' says Dalton, and they both looked at the windy, and at one another—and then back again—overjoyed, in a soart of a way, and frightened all at onst. Old Oliver was bad with the rheumatism in his knee, and went lame-like. So away goes Dalton to the hall-door, and he calls 'who's there?' and no answer. 'Maybe,' says Dalton, to himself, 'tis what he's rid round to the back-door;' so to the back-door with him, and there he shouts again—and no answer, and not a sound outside—and he began to feel quare, and to the hall-door with him back again. 'Who's there? do you hear, who's there?' he shouts, and receiving no answer still. 'I'll open the door at any rate,' says he, 'maybe it's what he's made his escape,' for they knew all about his troubles, 'and wants to get in without noise,' so praying all the time—for his mind misgave him, it might not be all right—he shifts the bars, and unlocks the door; but neither man, woman, nor child, nor horse, nor any living shape was standing there, only something or another slipt into the house close by his leg; it might be a dog, or something that way, he could not tell, for he only seen it for a moment with the corner of his eye, and it went in just like as if it belonged to the place. He could not see which way it went, up or down, but the house was never a happy one, or a quiet house after; and Dalton bangs the hall-door, and he took a sort of a turn and a thrembling, and back with him to Oliver, the butler, looking as white as the blank leaf of his master's letter, that was fluttering between his finger and thumb. 'What is it? what is it?' says the butler, catching his crutch like a waypon, fastening his eyes on Dalton's white face, and growing almost as pale himself. 'The master's dead,' says Dalton—and so he was, signs on it.

"After the turn she got by what she seen in the orchard, when she came to know the truth of what it was, Jinny Cresswell, you may be sure, did not stay there an hour longer than she could help: and she began to take notice of things she did not mind before—such as when she went into the big bed room over the hall, that the lord used to sleep in, whenever she went in at one door the other door used to be pulled to very quick, as if some one avoiding her was getting out in haste ; but the thing that frightened her most was just this—that sometimes she used to find a long straight mark from the head to the foot of her bed, as if 'twas made by something heavy lying there, and the place where it was, used to feel warm—as if—whoever it was—they only left it as she came into the room.

“ But the worst of all was poor Kitty Halpin, the young woman that died of what she seen. Her mother said it was how she was kept awake all the night with the walking about of some one in the next room, tumbling about boxes, and pulling over drawers, and talking and sighing to himself, and she, poor thing, wishing to go to sleep, and wondering who it could be, when in he comes, a fine man, in a loose silk morning-dress, an' no wig, but a velvet cap on, and to the windy with him quiet and aisy, and she makes a turn in the bed to let him know there was some one there, thinking he'd go away, but instead of that, over he comes to the side of the bed, looking very bad, and says something to her—but his speech was thick and choakin' like a dummy's that id be trying to spake—and she grew very frightened, and says she, ‘ I ask your honor's pardon, sir, but I can't hear you right,’ and with that he stretches up his neck nigh out of his cravat, turning his face up towards the ceiling, and—grace between us and harm !—his throat was cut across, and wide open ; she seen no more, but dropped in a dead faint in the bed, and back to her mother with her in the morning, and she never swallied bit or sup more, only she just sat by the fire holding her mother's hand, crying and trembling, and peepin' over her shoulder, and starting with every sound, till she took the fever and died, poor thing, not five weeks after.”—— narrative, while Lilius dropped into dreamless sleep, and then the story-teller stole away to her own tidy bed room and innocent slumbers.

And so on, and on, and on flowed the stream of old Sally's

---

CHAPTER XII.

IN WHICH THE RECTOR VISITS THE TILED HOUSE, AND DOCTOR TOOLE LOOKS AFTER THE BRASS CASTLE.

NEXT morning Toole, sauntering along the low road toward the mills, saw two hackney coaches and a "noddy" arrive at "the Brass Castle," a tall old house by the river, with a little bit of a flower-garden, half-a-dozen poplars, and a few privet hedges about it; and being aware that it had been taken the day before for Mr. Dangerfield, for three months, he slackened his pace, in the hope of seeing that personage, of whom he had heard great things, take seisin of his tabernacle. He was disappointed, however; the great man had not arrived, only a sour faced, fussy old lady, Mrs. Jukes, his housekeeper, and a servant-wench, and a great lot of boxes and trunks; and so he strolled back to the Phoenix, where a new evidence of the impending arrival met his view in an English groom with three horses, which the hostler and he were leading into the inn yard.

There were others, too, agreeably fidgeted about this arrival. The fair Miss Magnolia, for instance, and her enterprising parent, the agreeable Mrs. Macnamara: who both, as they gaped and peeped from the windows, bouncing up from the breakfast-table every minute, to the silent distress of quiet little Major O'Neil, painted all sorts of handsome portraits, and agreeable landscapes, and cloud-capped castles, each for her private contemplation, on the spreading canvas of her hopes.

Dr. Walsingham rode down to the "Tiled House," where workmen were already preparing to make things a little more comfortable. The towering hall-door stood half open; and down the broad stairs—his tall, slim figure, showing black against the light of the discolored lobby-window—his raven hair reached to his shoulders—Mervyn, the pale, large-eyed genius of that haunted place, came to meet him. He led him into the cedar parlor, the stained and dusty windows of which opened upon that moss-grown orchard, among whose great trunks and arches those strange shapes were said sometimes to have walked at night, like penitents and mourners through cathedral pillars.

It was a reception as stately, but as sombre and as beggarly withal as that of the Master of Ravenswood, for there were but two chairs in the cedar-parlor—one with but three legs, the other without a bottom; so they were fain to stand. But Mervyn could smile without bitterness, and his desolation had not the sting of actual poverty, as he begged the rector, to excuse his dreary welcome, and hoped that he would find things better the next time.

Their little colloquy got on very easily, for Mervyn liked the rector, and felt a confidence in him which was comfortable and almost exhilarating. The Doctor had a cheery, kindly, robust voice, and a good, honest emphasis in his talk; a guileless blue eye; a face furrowed, thoughtfully, and benevolent; well formed too. He must have been a handsome curate in his day. Not uncourtly, but honest: the politeness of a gentle and tender heart; very courteous and popular among ladies, although he sometimes forgot that they knew no Latin.

So Mervyn drew nigh to him in spirit, and liked him, and talked to him rather more freely than he had done to anybody else for a long time. It would seem that the young man had formed no very distinct plan of life. He appeared to have some thought of volunteering to serve in America, and some of entering into a foreign service ; but his plans were, I suppose, in nubibus. All that was plain was that he was restless and eager for some change—any.

It was not a very long visit, you may suppose ; and just as Dr. Walsingham rode out of the avenue, Lord Castle-mallard was riding leisurely by towards Chapelized, followed by his groom.

He was just going down to the town to see whether Danger-field had arrived, and slackened his pace to allow the Doctor to join him, for he could ride with him more comfortably than with parsons generally, the Doctor being well descended, and having married, besides, into a good family. He stared, as he passed, at the old house listlessly and peevishly. He had heard of Mervyn's doings there, and did not like them

" Yes, sir, he's a very pretty young man, and very well dressed," said his lordship, with manifest dissatisfaction ; " but I don't like meeting him, you know. 'Tis not his fault ; but one can't help thinking of—of things ; and I'd be glad his friends would advise him not to dress in velvets, you know—particularly black velvets—you can understand. I could not help thinking, at the time, of a pall, somehow. I'm not—no—not pleasant near him. No—I—I can't—his face is so pale—it looks like a reflection from one that's still paler—you understand—and in short, even in his perfumes there's a taint of—of—you know—a taint of blood, sir." Then there was a pause, during which he kept slapping his boot peevishly with his little riding-whip. " One can't of course, but be kind," he recommenced, " I can't do much—I can't make him acceptable, you know—but I pity him, Dr. Walsingham, and I've tried to be kind to him, you know that ; for ten years I had all the trouble, sir, of a guardian without the authority of one. Yes, of course we're kind ; but body o' me ! sir, he'd be better any where else than here, and without occupation, you know, quite idle, and so conspi-cuons. I promise you there are more than I who think it. And he has commenced fitting up that vile old house. It is ready to tumble down, and you know the trouble I was put to by that corpotion fellow — a — what's his name — about it: and he can't let it — people's servants won't stay in it, you know, the people tell such stories about it, I'm told; and what business has he here, you know? It is all very fine for a week or so, but they'll find him out, they will, sir. He may call himself Mervyn, or Fitzgerald, or Thompson, sir, or any other name, but it won't do, sir. The people down in this little village here, sir, are plaguy sharp — they're cunning: upon my life, I believe they are too hard for Nutter."

In fact, Sturk had been urging on his lordship the purchase of this little property, which, for many reasons, ought to be had a bargain, and adjoined Lord Castlemallard's, and had talked him into viewing it quite as an object. No wonder, then, he should look on Mervyn's restorations and residences in the light of an impertinence and an intrusion.

---

CHAPTER XIII.

RELATING HOW PUDDOCK PURGED O'FLAHERTY'S HEAD—A CHAPTER WHICH, IT IS HOPED, NO GENTEEL PERSON WILL READ.

RUM disagreed with O'Flaherty confoundedly, but, being of an obstinate courage not easily to be put down and liking that fluid, and being young withal, he drank it defiantly and liberally whenever it came in his way. So this morning he announced to his friend Puddock that he was suffering under a head-ache "that 'id burst a pot." The gallant fellow's stomach, too, was qualmish and disturbed. He heard of breakfast with loathing. Puddock rather imperiously insisted on his drinking some tea, which he abhorred, and of which he drearily partook.

"I tell you what, thir," said Puddock, finding his patient nothing better, and not relishing the notion of presenting his man in that seedy condition upon the field: "I've got a remedy, a very thimble one: it used to do wondereth for my poor uncle Neagle, who loved rum shrub, though it gave him the headache always, and sometimes the gout."

And Puddock had up Mrs. Hogg, his landlady, and ordered a pair of little muslin bags about the size of a pistol-cartridge each, which she promised to prepare in five minutes, and he himself tumbled over the leaves of his private manuscript quarto—a desultory and miscellaneous album, stuffed with sonnets on Celia's eye—a lock of hair, or a pansy here or there addressed to Sacharissa, receipts for "puptions," "farces," &c.; and finally, that he was in search of, to wit, "My great aunt Bell's recipe for purging the head" (good against melancholy or the head-ache). You are not to suppose that the volume was slovenly or in anywise unworthy of a gentleman and officer of those days. It was bound in red and gold, had two handsome silver gilt clasps and red edges, the writing being exquisitely straight and legible, and without a single blot.

"I have them all except—two—three," murmured the thoughtful Puddock when he had read over the list of ingredients. These, however, he got from Toole, close at hand, and with a little silver grater and a pretty little agate pocket pestle and mortar, he made a wonderful powder, "nutmeg and ginger, cinnamon and cloves," as the song says, and every other stinging product of nature and chemistry which the author of this famous family "purge for the head" could bring to remembrance; and certainly it was potent. With this the cartridges were loaded, the ends tied up, and O'Flaherty placed behind a table on which stood a basin, commenced the serious operation, under Puddock's directions, by introducing a bag at each side of his mouth, which, as a man of honor, he was bound to retain there until Puddock had had his morning's tete-a-tete with the barber.

"Be the powers, sorr, that was the stuff!" said O'Flaherty, discussing the composition afterwards, with an awful shake of his head; "my chops wor blazing before you could count twenty."

It was martyrdom; but anything was better than the incapacity which threatened, and certainly, by the end of five minutes, his head was something better. In this satisfactory condition—Jerome being in the back garden brushing his regimentals, and preparing his other properties—he suddenly heard voices close to the door, and gracious powers! one was certainly Magnolia's.

"That born devil, Juddy Carrol," blazed forth O'Flaherty, afterwards, "pushed open the door; it sarved me right for not being in my own bedroom, and the door locked—though who'd a thought there was such a cruel eediot on airth—bad luck to her—as to show a leedy into a gentleman, with scarcely the half of his clothes on, and undhergoin' a soart iv an operation, I may say."

Happily the table behind which he stood was one of those old-fashioned toilet affairs, with the back part, which was turned towards the door, sheeted over with wood, so that his ungartered stockings and rascally old slippers were invisible. Even so, it was bad enough: he was arrayed in a shabby old silk roquelaire, and there was a towel upon his breast, pinned behind his neck. He had just a second to pop the basin under the table, and to whisk the towel violently from under his chin, drying that feature with merciless violence; when the officious Judy Carrol, with the facetious grin of a good-natured lady about to make two people happy, introduced the bewitching Magnolia, and her meek little uncle, Major O'Neill.

In they came, rejoicing, to ask the gallant fireworker to make one of a party of pleasure to Leixlip. O'Flaherty could not so much as hand the young lady a chair; to emerge from behind the table, or even to attempt a retreat, was, of course, not to be thought of in the existing state of affairs. The action of Puddock's recipe was such as to make his share in the little complimentary conversation that ensued very indistinct, and to oblige him, to his disgrace and despair, when the poor fellow tried a smile, actually to apply his towel hastily to his mouth.

He saw that his visitors observed those symptoms with some perplexity: the Major was looking steadfastly at O'Flaherty's lips, and unconsciously making corresponding movements with his own, and the fair Magnolia was evidently full of pleasant surprise and curiosity.

"I'm afraid, Lieutenant, you've got the toothache," said Miss Mag, with her usual agreeable simplicity.

In his alacrity to assure her there was no such a thing, he actually swallowed one of the bags. 'Twas no easy matter, and he grew very red, and stared frightfully, and swallowed a draught of water precipitately. His misery was indeed so great that at the conclusion of a polite little farewell speech of the Major's, he uttered an involuntary groan, and lively Miss Mag, with an odious titter, exclaimed—

"The little creature's teething, uncle, as sure as you're not; either that, or he's got a hot potato into his poor little mouzey-wouzey;" and poor O'Flaherty smiled a great silent moist smile at the well-bred pleasantry. The Major, who did not choose to hear Mag's banter, made a formal, but rather smiling salute. The Lieutenant returned it, and down came that unlucky basin with a shocking crash and jingle on the bare boards; a basin never made such a noise in smashing before, O'Flaherty thought, with a mental imprecation.

"Nothing — hashe — 'appened — shur," said O'Flaherty, whose articulation was affected a good deal, in terror lest the Major should arrest his departure.

So the Major and tall Miss Magnolia, with all her roses and lilies, and bold broad talk, and her wicked eyes, went down the stairs; and O'Flaherty, looking with lively emotion in the glass, at the unbecoming coup d'œil, heard that agreeable young lady laughing most riotously under the windows as she and the Major marched away.

It was well for Judy, that being of the gentler sex, the wrath of the fireworker could not wreak itself upon her. The oftener he viewed himself in the pier-glass, trying in vain to think he did not look so very badly after all, the more bitter were his feelings. Oh, that blackguard old silk morning gown! and his eyes so confoundedly red, and his hair all dishevelled—bad luck to that clar't! the wig was all right, that was his only comfort, and his mouth, "och, look at it; twist its natural size"—though that was no trifle.

"Another week I'll not stop in her lodgings," cried poor O'Flaherty, grinning at himself in the glass, "if she keeps that savage, Judy Carrol, here a day longer."

---

CHAPTER XIV.

ÆSCULAPIUS TO THE RESCUE.

It was not until Puddock had returned, that the gallant Fireworker recollected all on a sudden that he had swallowed one of the bags.

"Thwallowed ?—thwallowed it !" said Puddock, looking very blank and uncomfortable ; " why, thir, I told you you were to be very careful."

" Why, why curse it, it is not, 't isn't"—

" Not what, thir ?" demanded Puddock, briskly, but plainly disconcerted.

" Not anything—anything bad—or, or—there's no use in purtendin', Puddock," he resumed, turning quite yellow. " I see, sir, I see by your looks, it's what you think, I'm poisoned !"

" I—I—do not, thir, think you're poithoned," he replied, indignantly, but with some flurry ; " that is, there'th a great deal in it that could not pothibly do you harm—there's only one ingredient, yes—or, or, yes, perhapth three, but thertainly not more, that I don't quite know about—a—But why, my dear thir, why on earth did you violate the thimble directions—why did you thwallow a particle of it ?"

" Oeh, why did I let it into my mouth at all—the devil go with it !" retorted poor O'Flaherty, " an wasn't I the born eediot to put them divil's dumplins inside my mouth ? but I did not know what I was doin'—no more I didn't."

" It's a rethipe, thir," replied Puddock, with dignity, " from which my great uncle, General Neagle, derived frequent benefit."

" And here I am," says O'Flaherty, vehemently ; " and you don't know whether I'm poisoned or no !"

At this moment he saw Dr. Sturk passing by, and drummed violently at the window. The doctor was impressed by the summons ; for however queer the apparition, it was plain he was desperately in earnest.

" Let's see the recipe," said Sturk, drily ; " you think you're poisoned—I know you do ;" poor O'Flaherty had shrunk from disclosing the extent of his apprehensions, and only beat about the bush ; " and if you be, I lay you fifty, I can't save you, nor all the doctors in Dublin—show me the recipe."

Puddock put it before him, and Sturk looked at the back of the volume with a leisurely disdain, but finding no title there, returned to the recipe. They both stared on his face, without breathing, while he conned it over. When he came about half way, he whistled; and when he arrived at the end, he frowned hard; and squeezed his lips together till the red disappeared altogether, and he looked again at the back of the book, and then turned it round once more, reading the last line over with a severe expression.

"And so you actually swallowed this—this devil's dose, sir, did you?" demanded Sturk.

"I—I believe he did, thome of it; but I warned him, I did, upon my honor! Now, tell him, did I not warn you, my dear Lieutenant, not to thwallow," interposed little Puddock, who began to grow confoundedly agitated; but Sturk, silenced him with—

"I-p-pity you, sir," and "pity" shot like a pellet from his lips. "Why the deuce will you dabble in medicine, sir? Do you think it's a thing to be learnt in an afterneon out of the bottom of an old cookery-book?"

"Cookery-book! excuse me, Doctor Sturk," replied Puddock, offended. "I'm given to underthtand, thir, it'th to be found in Culpepper."

"Culpepper!" said Sturk, viciously. "Call poison—you have peppered him to a purpose, I promise you! How much of it, pray, sir, (to O'Flaherty,) have you got in your stomach?"

"Tell him, Puddock," said O'Flaherty, helplessly.

"Only a trifle I'll assure you," put in Puddock (I need not spell his lisp), extenuating, "in a little—a—muslin bag, about the size of the top joint of a lady's little finger."

"And—and—and—what is it?—is it—do you think—it's anything—anyways—dangerous?" faltered poor O'Flaherty.

"Dangerous!" responded Sturk, with an angry chuckle—indeed, he was specially vindictive against lay intruders upon the mystery of his craft; "why, yes—ha, ha!—just maybe a little. There are no less than two—three—five mortal poisons in it," said the Doctor, with emphatic acerbity. "You and Mr. Puddock will allow that's rather strong."

O'Flaherty sat down and looked at Sturk, and wiping his damp face and forehead, he got up without appearing to know where he was going. Puddock stood with his hands in his breeches' pockets, staring with his little round eyes on the Doctor, with a very foolish and rather guilty vacuity all over his plump face, rigid and speechless, for three or four seconds; then he put his hand, which did actually tremble, upon the Doctor's arm, and he said, very thickly—

"I feel, thir, you're right; it'th my fault, thir, I've poithoned him—merthiful goodneth!—I—I"— Puddock's distress acted for a moment upon O'Flaherty. He came up to him pale and queer, like a somnambulist, and shook his fingers very cordially with a very cold grasp.

"If it was the last word I ever spoke, Puddock, you're a good natured—he's a gentleman, sir—and it was all my own fault; he warned me, he did, again' swallyin' a dhrop of it—remember what I'm saying Doctor—'twas I that done it; I was always a botch, Puddock, an' a fool; and—and—gentlemen—good-by."

And the flowered dressing-gown and ungartered stockings disappeared through the door into the bed-room, from whence they heard a great souse on the bed, and the bedstead gave a dismal groan.

"Is there—is there nothing, Doctor—for mercy's sake, think—Doctor do—I conjure you—pray think—there must be something"—urged Puddock, imploringly,

"Ay, that's the way, sir, fellows quacking themselves and one another; when they get frightened, and with good reason, come to us and expect miracles; but, as in this case, the quantity was not very much, 'tis not, you see, overpowering, and he may do, if he takes what I'll send him."

Puddock was already at his bedside, shaking his hand hysterically, and tumbling his words out one over the other—

"You're thafe, my dear thir—dum thpiro thpero—he thayth—Dr. Thturk—he can thave you, my dear thir—my dear Lieutenant—my dear O'Flaherty—he can thave you, thir—thafe and thound, thir."

O'Flaherty, who had turned his face to the wall, in the bitterness of his situation—sat up like a shot, and gaping upon Puddock for a few seconds, relieved himself with a long sigh, a devotional upward roll of the eyes, and some muttered words of which the little ensign heard only "blessing," very fervently, and "catch me again," and "divil bel-lows it;" and forthwith out came one of the fireworker's long shanks, and O'Flaherty insisted on dressing, and shaving, and otherwise preparing as a gentleman and an officer, with great gaiety of heart, to meet his fate on the Fifteen Acres.

In due time arrived the antidote. It was enclosed in a gallipot, and was what I believe they called an electuary. I don't know whether it is an obsolete abomination now, but it looked like brick-dust and treacle, and what it was made of even Puddock could not divine. O'Flaherty, that great Hibernian athlete, unconsciously winced and shuddered like a child at sight of it. Puddock stirred it with the tip of a tea-spoon, and looked into it with inquisitive disgust, and seemed to smell it from a distance, lost for a minute in inward conjecture, and then with a slight bow, pushed it ceremoniously toward his brother in arms.

"There is not much the matter with me now—I feel well enough," said O'Flaherty, mildly, and eyeing the mixture askance; and after a little while he looked at Puddock. That disciplinarian understood the look, and said, peremptorily, shaking up his little powdered head, and lisping vehemently—

"Lieutenant O'Flaherty, sir! I insist on your instantly taking that physic. How you may feel, sir, has nothing to do with it. If you hesitate, I will withdraw my sanction to your going to the field, sir. There's no—there can be—no earthly excuse but a—a miserable objection to a—swallowing a—recipe, sir—that isn't—that is may be—not intended to please your palate, but to save your life, sir—remember, sir, you've swallowed that you ought not to have swallowed, and don't sir—don't—for both our sakes—I implore—and insist—don't trifle, sir."

O'Flaherty felt himself passing under the chill and dismal shadow of death once more, such was the eloquence of Puddock, and so impressible his own nature, as he followed the appeal of his second. "Life is sweet;" and, though the compound was nauseous, and a necessity upon him of swallowing it in horrid instalments, spoonful after spoonful, yet, he did contrive to get through it pretty well, except a little residuum in the bottom, which Puddock wisely conived at.

The clink of a horse-shoe drew Puddock to the window. Sturk riding into town, reined in his generous beast, and called up to the little Lieutenant,

"Well, he's taken it, eh?"

Puddock smiled a pleasant smile, and nodded.

"Walk him about, then, for an hour or so, and he'll do."

"Thank you, thir," said little Puddock, gaily.

"Don't thank me, sir, either of you, but remember the lesson you've got," said the Doctor tartly, and away he plunged into a sharp trot, with a cling-clang and a cloud of dust. And Puddock followed that ungracious leech, with a stare of gratitude and admiration, almost with a benediction. And this anxiety relieved, he and his principal prepared forthwith to provide real work for the surgeons.

---

CHAPTER XV.

THE ORDEAL BY BATTLE.

THAT flanking demi-bastion of the Magazine, crenelled for musketry, commands, with the aid of a couple of good field-glasses, an excellent and secret view of the arena on which the redoubted O'Flaherty and the grim Nutter were about to put their metal to the proof. General Chatterworth, who happened to have an appointment, as he told his sister at breakfast, in town about that hour, forgot it just as he reached the Magazine, gave his bridle to the groom, and stumped into the fortress, where he had a biscuit and a glass of sherry in the Commandant's little parlor, and forth the two cronies sallied mysteriously, side by side; the Commandant, Colonel Bligh, being remarkably tall, slim, and straight, with an austere, mulberry-colored face; the General stout and stumpy, and smiling plentifully, short of breath, and double-chinned, they got into the sanctum I have just mentioned. From this coigne of vantage, looking westward over the broad green level toward the thin smoke that rose from Chapelized chimneys lying so snugly in the lap of the hollow by the river; the famous Fifteen Acres, where so many heroes have measured swords, was distinctly displayed in the near foreground. You all know the artillery butt. Well, that was the centre of a circular enclosure containing just fifteen acres, with broad entrances eastward and westward.

The old fellows knew very well where to look.

Father Roach was quite accidentally there, reading his breviary when the hostile parties came upon the ground—for except when an accident of this sort occurred, or the troops were being drilled, it was a sequestered spot enough—and he forthwith joined them, as usual, to reconcile the dread debate.

"I don't ask particulars, my dear—I abominate all that concerns a quarrel; but, Lieutenant O'Flaherty, jewel, supposin' the very worst—supposin', just for argument, that he has horsewhipped you"——

"An' who dar' suppose it?" glared O'Flaherty.

"Or, we'll take it that he spit in your face. Well," continued his reverence, not choosing to hear the shocking ejaculations which this hypothesis wrung from the lieutenant; "what of that, my darlin'. Think of indignities, insults, and disgraces that the blessed Saint Martellus suffered, without allowing anything worse to cross his lips than an Ave Mary or a smile iv resignation."

"Ordher that the priest off the ground, sorr," said O'Flaherty, lividly, to little Puddock, who was too busy with Mr. Mahony to hear him; and Roach had already transferred his pious offices to Nutter, who speedily flushed up, and became, to all appearances, in his own way, just as angry as O'Flaherty.

"Lieutenant O'Flaherty, a word in your ear," once more droned the mellow voice of Father Roach; "you're a young man, my dear, and here's Lieutenant Puddock by your side, a young man too; I'm as ould, my honies, as the two of you put together, an' I advise you, for your good—don't shed human blood; don't be led or said by them army-gentlemen, that's always standin' up for fightin', because the leedies admire fightin' men. They'll call you cowards, polthroons, curs, sneaks, turn-tails—let them!"

"There's no standin' this any longer, Puddock," said O'Flaherty, incensed indescribably by the odious names which his reverence was hypothetically accumulating; "if you want to see the 'fightin', Father Roach, stay here, an' look your full, an' welcome, only don't make a noise; behave like a Christian, an' hould your tongue; but if you really hate fightin', as you say"—

Having reached this point in his address, O'Flaherty suddenly stopped short, drew himself into a stooping posture, with a flush and a strange distortion, and his eyes fastened upon Father Roach with an unearthly glare for nearly two minutes, and seized Puddock upon the upper part of his arm with so awful a grip, that the gallant little gentleman piped out in a flurry of anguish—

"O—O—O'Flaherty, thir—let go my arm, thir."

O'Flaherty drew a long breath, uttered a short, deep groan, and wiping the moisture from his red forehead, and resuming a perpendicular position was evidently trying to recover the lost thread of his discourse.

"There'th dethidedly thomething the matter with you, thir," said Puddock, anxiously sotto voce, while he worked his injured arm a little at the shoulder.

"I tell you what, Puddock—there's no use in purtendin'—the poison's working—that's what's the matter;" returned poor O'Flaherty, in what romance-writers call "a hissing whisper."

"But—but it can't be—you forget Dr. Thturk and—oh, dear!—the antidote. It—I thay—it can't be, thir," said Puddock, rapidly.

"It's no use, now; but I shirked two or three spoonfuls, and I left some more in the bottom," said the gigantic O'Flaherty, with a gloomy sheepishness.

Puddock could only look at him, and then said, quite meekly—

“Well, and my dear thir, what on earth had we better do?”

“Do,” said O’Flaherty, “why isn’t it complety Hobson’s choice with us? What can we do but go through with it?”

The fact is, I may as well mention, that the poison had very little to do with it, and the antidote a great deal. In fact, it was a reckless compound conceived in a cynical and angry spirit by Sturk, and as the fireworker afterwards declared, while expressing in excited language his wonder how Puddock (for he never suspected Sturk’s elixir) had contrived to compound such a poison—“The torture was such, as fairly thranslated me into the purlieus of the other world.”

Nutter had already put off his coat and waist-coat, and appeared in a neat little black lutestring vest, with sleeves to it, which the elder officers of the R.I.A. remembered well in by-gone fencing matches.

And now preliminaries were quite adjusted; and Nutter, stepped out with his vicious weapon in hand, and his eyes looking white and stony out of his dark face. A word or two to his armor-bearer, and a rapid gesture right and left, and that magnificent squire spoke low to two or three of the surrounding officers, who forthwith bestirred themselves to keep back the crowd, and as it were to keep the ring unbroken. O’Flaherty took his sword—got his hand well into the hilt, poised the blade, shook himself up as it were, and made a feint or two and a parry in the air, and so began to advance, like Goliath, towards little Nutter.

“Now, Puddock, back him up—encourage your man,” said Devereux, who took a perverse pleasure in joking; “tell him to flay the lump, splat him, divide him, and cut him in two pieces—”

It was a custom of the corps to quiz Puddock about his cookery; but Puddock, I suppose, did not hear his last night's "receipt" quoted, and he kept his eye upon his man, who had now got nearly within fencing distance of his adversary. But at this critical moment, O'Flaherty, much to Puddock's disgust, suddenly stopped, and got into the old stooping posture, making an appalling grimace in what looked like an endeavor to swallow, not all his under lip, but his chin also. Uttering a quivering groan, he continued to stoop nearer to the earth, on which he finally actually sat down and hugged his knees close to his chest, holding his breath all the time till he was perfectly purple, and rocking himself this way and that.

The whole procedure was a mystery to everybody except the guilty Puddock, who changed color, and in manifest perturbation, skipped to his side.

"Bleth me—bleth me—my dear O'Flaherty, he'th very ill—where ith it—where ith the pain?"

"Is it 'farced pain,' Puddock, or 'gammon pain?'" asked Devereux, with much concern.

Puddock's plump panic-stricken little face, and staring eyeballs, were approached close to the writhing features of his redoubted principal.

"I wish to heaven I had thwallowed it myself—it'h dreadful—what ith to be—are you eathier—I think you're eathier."

I don't think O'Flaherty heard him. He only hugged his knees tighter, and slowly turned up his face, wrung into ten thousand horrid puckers, to the sky, till his chin stood higher than his forehead, with his teeth and eyes shut, and he uttered a sound like a half-stifled screech.

Puddock threw his cocked-hat upon the ground and stamped in a momentary frenzy.

"He'th dying—Devereux—Cluffe—he'th—I tell you, he'th dying;" and he was on the point of declaring himself O'Flaherty's murderer, and surrendering himself as such into the hands of anybody who would accept the custody of his person, when the recollection of his official position as poor O'Flaberty's second flashed upon him, and collecting with a grand effort, his wits and his graces—

"It'th totally impothible, gentlemen," he said, with his most ceremonious bow; "conthidering the awful condition of my printhipal—I—I have reathon to fear—in fact I know—Dr. Thturk has theen him—that he'th under the action of poithon—and it'th quite impractithable, gentlemen, that thith affair of honor can protheed at prethent;" and Puddock drew himself up peremptorily, and replaced his hat, which somebody had slipped into his hand, upon his round powdered head.

Mr. Mahony, though a magnificent gentleman, was, perhaps, a little stupid, and he mistook Puddock's agitation, and thought he was in a passion, and disposed to be offensive. He, therefore, with a marked and stern sort of elegance, replied—

"Pison, sir, is a remarkably strong aipathet; it's language, sir, which, if a gentleman uses at all, he's bound in justice, in shivalry, and in dacency to a generous adversary, to define with precision. Mr. Nutter is too well known to the best o' society, moving in a circle, as he does, to require the painegeric of humble me. They drank together last night, they differed in opinion, that's true, but fourteen clear hours has expired, and pison being-mentioned"—

"Why, body o' me ! thir," cried Puddock, in fierce horror; "can you imagine for one moment, thir, that I or any man living could suppose, for an inthtant, that my rethpected friend, Mr. Nutter, to whom (a low bow to Nutter, returned by that gentleman) I have now the misfortune to be opposed, is capable—of poithoning any living being—man, woman, or child; and to put an end, thir, at once to all misapprehension upon this point, it wath I—I, thir—mythelf—who poithoned him, altogether accidentally, of courthe, by a valuable, but mithmanaged retheipt, this morning, thir—you—you see, Mr. Nutter!"

Nutter, baulked of his gentlemanlike satisfaction, stared with a horrified but somewhat foolish countenance from Puddock to O'Flaherty.

"And now, thir," pursued Puddock, addressing himself to Mr. Mahony; "if Mr. Nutter desires to postpone the combat, I consent; if not, I offer mythelf to maintain it inthead of my printhipal."

And so he made another low bow, and stood bareheaded, hat in hand, with his right hand on his sword hilt.

"Upon my honor, Captain Puddock, it's precisely what I was going to propose myself, sir," said Mahony, with great alacrity; "as the only way left us of getting honorably out of the great embarrassment in which we are placed by the premature death-struggles of your friend."

"My dear Puddock," whispered Devereux, in his ear, "surely you would not kill Nutter to oblige two such brutes as these?" indicating, by a glance, Nutter's splendid second and the magnanimous O'Flaherty, who was still sitting speechless upon the ground.

"Captain Puddock," pursued that mirror of courtesy, Mr. Patrick Mahony, of Muckafubble, who, by-the-by, persisted in giving him his captaincy, "may I inquire who's your friend upon this unexpected turn of affairs?"

"There's no need, sir," said Nutter, drily and stoutly "I would not hurt a hair of your hēād, Lieutenant Puddock."

"Do you hear him?" panted O'Flaherty, for the first time articulate, and stung by the unfortunate phrase—it seemed fated that Nutter should not open his lips without making some allusion to human hair; "do you hear him, Puddock?" Mr. Nutter—(he spoke with great difficulty, and in jerks)—sir—Mr. Nutter—you shall—ugh—you shall render a strict accow-ow-oh-im-m-m!"

The sound was smothered under his compressed lips, his face wrung itself again crimson with a hideous squeeze, and Puddock thought the moment of his dissolution was come, and almost wished it over.

"Don't try to thepeak—pray, thir, don't—there—there, now," urged Puddock, distractedly; but the injunction was unnecessary.

"Mr. Nutter," said his second, sulkily, "I don't see anything to satisfy your outraged honor in the curious spectacle of that gentleman sitting on the ground making faces; we came here not to trifle, but, as I conceive, to dispatch business, sir."

"To dispatch that unfortunate gentleman, you mean, and that seems pretty well done to your hand," says little Dr. Toole, bustling up from the coach where his instruments, lint, and plasters were deposited. "What's it all, eh?—oh, Dr. Sturk's been with him, eh? Oh, ho, ho, ho!" and he laughed sarcastically, in an undertone, and shrugged, as he stooped down and took O'Flaherty's pulse in his fingers and thumb.

"I tell you what, Mr. a—a—a—sir," said Nutter, with a very dangerous look; "I have had the honor of knowing Lieutenant Puddock since August, 1756; I won't hurt him, for I like and respect him; but, if fight I must, I'll fight you, sir!"

"Since August, 1756?" repeated Mr. Mahony, with prompt surprise. "Pooh! why didn't you mention that before? Why, sir, he's an old friend, and you could not pleasantly ask him to volunteer to bare his wapon against the bosom of his friend. No, sir, shivalry is the handmaid of Christian charity, and honor walks hand in hand with the human heart!"

With this noble sentiment he bowed and shook Nutter's cold, hard hand, and then Puddock's plump little white paw.

You are not to suppose that Pat Mahony, of Muckafubble, was a poltroon; on the contrary, he had fought several shocking duels, and displayed a remarkable amount of savagery and coolness; but having made a character he was satisfied therewith. They may talk of fighting for the fun of it, liking it, delighting in it; don't believe a word of it. We all hate it, and the hero is only he who hates it least.

"Ugh, I can't stand it any longer; take me out of this, some of you," said O'Flaherty, wiping the damp from his red face. "I don't think there's ten minutes' life in me."

"De profundis conclamavi," murmured fat Father Roach; "lean upon me, sir."

"And me," said little Toole.

"For the benefit of your poor soul, my honey, just say you forgive Mr. Nutter before you leave the field," said the priest quite sincerely.

"Anything at all, Father Roach," replied the sufferer; "only don't bother me."

"You forgive him then, aroon?" said the priest.

"Och, bother! forgive him, to be sure I do, That's supposin' mind, I don't recover; but if I do"——

"Och, pacible, pacible, my son," said Father Roach, patting his arm, and soothing him with his voice. "Nansince now, can't you be pacible—pacible my son—there now pacible, pacible."

Upon his two supporters, and followed by his little second, this towering sufferer was helped, and tumbled into the coach, into which Puddock, Toole, and the priest who was curious to see O'Flaherty's last moments, all followed; and they drove at a wild canter over the green grass, and toward Chapelizod, down the hill, quite frightfully, and were all within an ace of being capsized. But ultimately they reached, in various states of mind, but safely enough, O'Flaherty's lodgings.

Here the gigantic invalid who had suffered another paroxysm on the way, was slowly assisted to the ground by his awe struck and curious friends, and entered the house with a groan, and roared for Judy Carroll with a curse, and invoked Jerome, the cokang modate, with a horrible vociferation. And as among the hushed exhortations of the good priest, Toole and Puddock, he mounted the stairs, he took occasion over the bannister, in stentorian tones, to proclaim to the household his own awful situation, and the imminent approach of the moment of his dissolution.

---

CHAPTER XVI.

LIEUTENANT PUDDOCK RECEIVES AN INVITATION
AND A RAP OVER THE KNUCKLES.

THE old gentlemen, from their peep-holes in the Magazine, watched the progress of this remarkable affair of honor as well as they could, with the aid of their field-glasses, and through an interposing crowd.

"By Jupiter, sir, he's through him!" said Colonel Bligh, when he saw O'Flaherty go down.

"So he is, by George!" replied General Chatterworth; "but, eh, which is he?"

"The long fellow," said Bligh:

"O'Flaherty? — hey! — no, by George! — though so it is—there's work in Frank Nutter yet, by Jove," said the General, poking his glass and his fat face an inch or two nearer.

"The cool, old hand, sir, too much for your new fire-worker," remarked Bligh, cynically.

"Tut, sir, this O'Flaherty has not been three weeks among us," spluttered out the General, who was woundily jealous of the honor of his corps. "There are lads among our fireworkers who would whip Nutter through the liver while you'd count ten!"

"They're removing the—the—(a long pause) the body, eh?" said Bligh. "Hey! no, see, by George, he's walking, but he's hurt."

"I'm mighty well pleased it's no worse, sir," said the General, honestly glad.

"They're helping him into the coach—long legs the fellow's got," remarked Bligh.

"These—things—sir—are—are—very—un—pleasant," said the General, adjusting the focus of the glass, and speaking slowly—though no Spanish dandy ever relished a bull-fight more than he an affair of the kind. He and old Bligh had witnessed no less than five, in which officers of the R.I.A. were principal performers from the same snug post of observation. The General, indeed, was conventionally supposed to know nothing of them, and to reprobate the practice itself with his whole soul. But somehow, when an affair of the sort came off on the Fifteen Acres, he always happened to drop in, at the proper moment, upon his old crony, the Colonel, and they sauntered into the demi-bastion together, and quietly saw what was to be seen. It was Miss Becky Chatterworth who involved the poor General in this hypocrisy. It was not exactly her money; it was her force of will and unflinching audacity that established her control over an easy, harmless, plastic old gentleman.

"They are unpleasant—devilish unpleasant—somewhere in the body, I think, hey? they're stopping again, stopping again—eh?—plaguy unpleasant, sir. Ha! on they go again and a—Puddock—getting in—and that's Toole. He's not so much hurt—eh? He helped himself a good deal, you saw; but (taking heart of grace) when a quarrel does occur, sir, I believe, after all, 'tis better off the stomach at once—a few passes—you know—or the crack of a pistol—who's that got in—the priest—hey? by George!"

"Awkward if he dies a Papist," said cynical old Bligh—the R.I.A. were Protestant by constitution.

"That never happens in our corps, sir," said the General, haughtily; "but, as I say, when a quarrel—does—occur—sir—there, they're off at last; when it does occur—I say—heyday! what a thundering pace! a gallop, by George! that don't look well (a pause)—and—and—a—about what you were saying you know he couldn't die a Papist in our corps—no one does—no one ever did—it would be, you know—it would be a trick, sir, and O'Flaherty's a gentleman; it could not be; but then, sir, as I was saying, though the thing has its uses"——

"I'd like to know where society 'd be without it," interposed Bligh, with a sneer.

"Though it may have its uses, sir; it's not a thing one can sit down and say is right—we can't!"

"I've heard your sister, Miss Becky, speak strongly on that point, too," said Bligh.

"Ah! I dare say," said the General, quite innocently, and coughing a little. This was a sore point with the hen-pecked warrior, and the grim scarecrow by his side knew it, and grinned through the telescope; "and you see—I say—eh! I think they're breaking up, a—and—I say—I—it seems all over—eh—and so, dear Colonel, I must take my leave, and——"

And after a lingering look, he shut up his glass, and walked thoughtfully back with his friend.

A few hours afterwards, General Chatterworth, having just dismounted outside the Artillery barrack, to his surprise, met Puddock and O'Flaherty walking leisurely in the street of Chapelizod. O'Flaherty looked pale and shaky, and rather wild; and the General returned his salute, looking deuced hard at him, and wondering all the time in what part of his body (in his phrase), "he had got;" and how the plague the doctors had put him so soon on his legs again.

"Ha, Lieutenant Puddock," with a smile, which Puddock thought significant—"give you good evening, sir,—Dr. Toole anywhere about, or have you seen Sturk?"

"No, he had not."

The General wanted to hear by accident, or in confidence, all about it; and having engaged Puddock in talk, that officer followed by his side.

"I should be glad of the honor of your company, Lieutenant Puddock, to dinner this evening—Sturk comes, and Captain Cluffe, and this wonderful Mr. Dangerfield too, of whom we all heard so much as mess, at five o'clock, if the invitation's not too late."

The Lieutenant acknowledged and accepted, with a blush and a very low bow, his commanding officer's hospitality.

"And—a—I say, Puddock—Lieutenant O'Flaherty, I thought—I—I thought, d'ye see, just now, eh? (he looked inquisitively, but there was no answer); I thought, I say, he looked devilish out of sorts, is he—a—ill?"

"He was very ill, indeed, this afternoon, General; a thudden attack"——

The General looked quickly at Puddock's plump, consequential face; but there was no further light in it.

"And—a—Lieutenant Puddock, you were saying—a—tell me—now, where was it?"

"In the Park, General," said Puddock, in perfect good faith.

"Eh? ah! in the Park, was it? but I want to know, you know, what part of the body—d'ye see—the shoulder—or?"——

"The duodenum, Dr. Toole called it, just here, General," and he pressed his fingers to what is popularly known as the "pit" of his stomach.

"What, sir, do you mean to say the pit of his stomach?"

said the General, with more horror and indignation than he often showed.

"Yes, just about that point, General, and the pain was very violent, indeed," answered Puddock, looking with a puzzled stare at the General's stern and horrified countenance—an officer might have a pain in his stomach, he thought, without exciting all that emotion.

"And what in the name of Bedlam, sir, does he mean by walking about the town with a hole through his—his—what's his name? I'm hanged but I'll place him under arrest this moment," the General thundered, and his little eyes swept the perspective this way and that, as if they would leap from their sockets in search of the reckless O'Flaherty. "That's the way to make him lie quiet, and keep his bed, till he heals, sir."

Puddock explained, and the storm subsided, rumbling off in half a dozen testy assertions on the General's part that he, Puddock, had distinctly used the word "wounded," and now and then renewing faintly, in a muttered explosion, on the troubles and worries of his command, and a great many "pshaws!" and several fits of coughing, for the General continued out of breath for some time. He had showed his cards, however, and so, in a dignified disconcerted sort of way, he told Puddock that he had heard something about O'Flaherty's having got most improperly into a foolish quarrel, and having met Nutter that afternoon, and for a moment feared he might have been hurt; and then came inquiries about Nutter, and there appeared to have been no one hurt, and yet the parties on the ground, and no fighting, and yet no reconciliation, and, in fact, the General was so puzzled with this conundrum, that he was very near calling after Puddock, when they parted at the bridge, and making him entertain him, at some cost of consistency, with the whole story.

So Puddock, his head full of delicious visions, marched homeward, to powder and perfume, and otherwise equip for that banquet of the gods, of which he was to partake at five o'clock, and just as he turned the corner at "The Phoenix," who should he behold, sailing down the Dublin road from the King's House, with a grand powdered footman, bearing his cane of office, and a great bouquet behind her, and Gertrude Chatterworth by her side, but the splendid and formidable Aunt Becky, who had just been paying her compliments to old Mrs. Colonel Stafford, from whom she had heard all about the duel. So as Puddock's fat cheeks grew pink at sight of Miss Gertrude, all Aunt Becky's color flashed into her face, as her keen, prominent black eye pierced the unconscious Lieutenant from afar off, and chin and nose high in air, her mouth just a little tucked in, as it were, at one corner—a certain sign of coming storm—an angry hectic in each cheek, a fierce flirt of her fan, and two or three short sniffs that betokened mischief—she quickened her pace, leaving her niece a good way in the rear, in her haste to engage the enemy. Before she came up she commenced the action at a long range, and very abruptly; and as Nutter, who, like all his friends, in turns, experience once or twice "a taste of her quality," observed to his wife, "by Jove, that woman says things for which she ought to be put in the watch-house." So now and here she maintained her reputation—

"You ought to be flogged, sir; yes," she insisted answering Puddock's bewildered stare, "tied up to the halberts and flogged."

Aunt Rebecca was accompanied by at least half a dozen lap-dogs, and those intelligent brutes, aware of his disgrace beset poor Puddock's legs with a furious vociferation.

"Madam," said he, his ears tingling, and making a prodigious low bow; "commissioned officers are never flogged."

"So much the worse for the service, sir; and the sooner they abolish that anomalous distinction the better. I'd have them begin, sir, with you, and your accomplice in murder, Lieutenant O'Flaherty."

"Madam! your most obedient humble servant," said Puddock, with another bow, still more ceremonious, flushing up intensely to the very roots of his powdered hair.

"Good evening, sir," said Aunt Becky, with an energetic toss of her head, having discharged her shot; and with an averted countenance, and in high disdain, she swept grandly on, quite forgetting her niece, who said a pleasant word or two to Puddock as she passed, and smiled so kindly, that he was quite consoled, and on the whole was made happy and elated by the rencontre, and went home to his wash-balls and perfumes in a hopeful though somewhat excited state.

Indeed, the little Lieutenant knew that kind-hearted terramagant, Aunt Becky, too well, to be long cast down or even flurried by her onset. When the same little Puddock, about a year ago, had that ugly attack of pleurisy, and was so low and so long about recovering, she treated him as kindly as if he were her own son, in the matter of jellies, strong soups, and curious light wines, and had afterwards lent him some good books which the Lieutenant had read through, like a man of honor as he was. And, indeed, what specially piqued Aunt Becky's resentment just now was, that having had, about that time, a good deal of talk with Puddock upon the particular subject of duelling, he had, as she thought, taken very kindly to her way of thinking; and she had a dozen times in the last month, cited Puddock to the General, and so his public defection was highly mortifying and intolerable.

So Puddock in a not unpleasant fuss and excitement sat down in his dressing-gown before the glass; and Moore the barber, with tongs, powder, and pomade, repaired the dilapidations of the day.

CHAPTER XVII.

RELATING HOW THE GENTLEMEN SAT OVER THEIR CLARET, AND HOW DOCTOR STURK SAW A FACE.

PUDDOCK drove up the avenue of gentlemanlike old poplars, and over the little bridge, and under the high-arched bowers of elms, walled up at either side with evergreens, and so into the court-yard of Belmont. It was always pleasant to dine at the white old house. Old General Chatterworth was so genuinely hospitable and so really glad to see you, and so hilarious himself, and so enjoying. He had a good-natured word and a cordial smile for everybody; and he had a good cook, and explained his dishes to those beside him, and used sometimes to toddle out himself to the cellar in search of a curious bonbouche; and of nearly every bin in it he had a little anecdote or a pedigree to relate.

Miss Becky Chatterworth received Puddock very loftily and only touched his hand with the tips of her fingers. It was plain he was not yet taken into favor. When he entered the drawing room, that handsome stranger, with the large eyes,—Mr. Mervyn—was leaning upon the high back of a chair, and talking agreeably, as it seemed, to Miss Gertrude. He had a shake of the hand and a fashionable greeting from stout, dandified Captain Cluffe, who was by no means so young as he would be supposed. Sturk, leaning at the window with his shoulders to the wall, beckoned Puddock gruffly, and cross-examined him in an undertone as to the issue of O'Flaherty's case. Of course he knew all about the duel, but the corps also knew that Sturk would not attend on the ground in any affair where the Royal Irish Artillery were concerned, and therefore they could bring what doctor they pleased to the field without an affront.

"And see, my buck," said Sturk, winding up rather savagely with a sneer; "you've got out of that scrape, you and your patient, by a piece of good luck that's not like to happen twice over; so take my advice, and cut that leaf out of your—your—grandmother's cookery book, and light your pipe with it."

This slight way of treating both his book and his ancestors nettled little Puddock—who never himself took a liberty, and expected similar treatment—but he knew Sturk, and only bowed grandly, and went to pay his respects to cowed, kindly, querulous little Mrs. Sturk, at the other end of the room. An elderly gentleman, with a rather white face, a high forehead and grim look, was chatting briskly with her; and Puddock, the moment his eye lighted upon the stranger, felt that there was something remarkable about him. Taken in detail, indeed, he was insignificant. He was dressed as quietly as the style of that day would allow, yet in his toilet there was entire ease and even a latent air of fashion. He wore his own hair; and though there was a little powder upon it and upon his coat collar, it was perfectly white, frizzed out a little at the sides, and gathered into a bag behind. The stranger rose and bowed as Puddock approached the lady, and the Lieutenant had a nearer view of his great white forehead—his only good feature—and the pair of silver spectacles that glimmered under it, and his small hooked nose and stern mouth.

"'Tis a mean countenance," said the general, talking him over when the company had dispersed.

"No countenance," said Miss Becky, decisively, "could be mean with such a forehead."

The fact is—the features, taken separately, with one exception, were insignificant; but the face was singular, with its strange pallor, its intellectual mastery, and sarcastic decision.

The General, who had accidentally omitted the ceremony—in those days essential—now strutted up to introduce them.

"Mr. Dangerfield, will you permit me to present my good friend and officer, Lieutenant Puddock. Lieutenant Puddock, Mr. Dangerfield—Mr. Dangerfield, Lieutenant Puddock."

And there was a great deal of pretty bowing, and each was the other's "most obedient," and declared himself honored; and the conventional parenthesis ended, things returned to their former course.

Puddock only perceived that Mrs. Sturk was giving Dangerfield a rambling sort of account of the people of Chapelizod. Dangerfield, to do him justice, listened attentively. In fact, he had led her upon that particular theme, and as easily and cleverly kept her close to the subject. For he was not a general to manœuvre without knowing first how the ground lay, and had an active, inquiring mind, in which he made all sorts of little notes.

So Mrs. Sturk prattled on, to her own and Mr. Dangerfield's content, for she was garrulous when not under the eye of her lord, and always gentle, though given to lamentation, having commonly many small hardships to mention. So, quite without malice or retention, she poured out the gossip of the town, but not its scandal. Indeed, she was a very harmless, and rather sweet, though dolorous little body, and was very fond of children, especially her own, who would have been ruined were it not that they quailed as much as she did before Sturk, on whom she looked as by far the eleverest and most awful mortal then extant, and never doubted that the world thought so too.

When they came down to dinner, the gallant Captain Cluffe contrived to seat himself beside Aunt Becky, to whom the rogue commended himself by making a corner on his chair, next hers, for that odious greedy little brute, "Fancy," and by a hundred other adroit and amiable attentions. And having a perfect acquaintance with all her weak points—he had no difficulty in finding topics to interest her, and in conversing acceptably thereupon. And, indeed, whenever he was mentioned sometime after, she used to remark that Captain Cluffe was a very conversable and worthy-young (!) man.

In truth, that dinner went swiftly and pleasantly over for many of the guests. Gertrude Chatterworth was placed between the enamored Puddock and the large-eyed, handsome, mysterious Mervyn. Of course, the hour flew with light and roseate wings for her. Little Puddock was in great force, and chatted with energy, and his theatrical lore, and his oddities, made him not unamusing. So she smiled on him more than usual, to make amends for the frowns of the higher powers, and he was as happy as a prince and as proud as a peacock, and quite tipsy with his success.

It is not always easy to know what young ladies like best or least, or quite what they are driving at; and Cluffe, from the other side of the table, thought, though Puddock was an agreeable fellow, and exerting himself uncommonly, that Miss Gertrude would have been well content to exchange him for the wooden lay-figure on which she hung her draperies when she sketched, which might have worn his uniform and filled his chair, and spared her his agreeable conversation, and which had eyes and saw not, and ears and heard not. In short, the cunning fellow fancied he saw, by many small signs, a very decided preference on her part for the handsome and melancholy, but evidently eloquent stranger.

Like other cunning fellows, however, Cluffe was not always right ; and right or wrong, in his own illusions, if such they were, little Puddock was, for the time, substantially blessed.

The plump and happy Lieutenant, when the ladies were flown away to the drawing-room and their small tea cups, waxed silent and sentimental, but being a generous rival, and feeling that he could afford it, made a little effort, and engaged Mervyn in talk, and found him pleasantly versed in many things of which he knew little, and especially in the Continental stage and drama, upon which Puddock heard him greedily ; and the General's bustling talk helped to keep the company merry, and he treated them to a bottle of the identical sack of which his own father's wedding posset had been compounded ! Dangerfield, in a rather harsh voice, but agreeably and intelligently withal, told some rather pleasant stories about old wines and curious wine fanciers ; and Cluffe and Puddock, who often sang together, being called on by the General, chanted a duet rather prettily, though neither, separately, had much of a voice. And the incorrigible Puddock, apropos of a piece of a whale once eaten by Dangerfield, after his wont, related a wonderful receipt—"a weaver surprised." The "weaver" turned out to be a fish, and the "surprising" was the popping him out of ice into boiling water, with after details, which made the old General shake and laugh till tears bedewed his honest cheeks. And Mervyn and Dangerfield, as much surprised as the weaver, both looked, each in his own way, a little curiously at the young warrior who possessed this remarkable knowledge.

And the claret, like the General's other wines, was very good, and Dangerfield said a stern word or two in its praise, and guessed its vintage, to his host's great elation, who, with Lord Castlemallard, began to think Dangerfield a very wonderful man.

Doctor Sturk alone, sipped his claret silently ; looking thoughtfully a good deal at Dangerfield over the way, and when spoken to seemed to waken up, but dropped out of the conversation again; though this was odd, for he had intended giving Dangerfield a bit of his mind as to what might be made of the Castlemallard estates, and by implication letting in some light upon Nutter's mismanagement.

When Dr. Sturk had come into the drawing-room before dinner, Dangerfield was turning over a portfolio in the shade beyond the window, and the evening sun was shining strongly in his own face; so that during the ceremony of introduction he had seen next to nothing of him, and then sauntered away to the bow window at the other end, where the ladies were assembled, to make his obeisance.

But at the dinner-table he was placed directly opposite, with the advantage of a very distinct view; and the face, relieved against the dark stamped leather hangings on the wall, stood out like a sharply-painted portrait, and produced an odd and unpleasant effect upon Sturk, who could not help puzzling himself then, and for a long time after, with un. availing speculations about him.

The grim white man opposite did not appear to trouble his head about Sturk. He eat his dinner energetically, chatted laconically but rather pleasantly. Sturk thought he might be eight-and-forty, or perhaps six or seven-and-fifty—it was a face without a date. He went over all his points, insignificant features, high forehead, stern countenance, abruptly speaking, spectacles, harsh voice, harsher laugh, something sinister perhaps. The image, as a whole, seemed to Sturk to fill in the outlines of a recollection, which yet was not a recollection. He could not seize it; it was a decidedly unpleasant impression of having seen him before, but where he could not bring to mind. “He got me into some confounded trouble some time or other,” thought Sturk, in his uneasy dream; “the sight of him is like a thump in the pit of my stomach. Was he the sheriff's deputy at Chester, when that rascally Jew-tailor followed me? Dangerfield—Dangerfield—Dangerfield—no ; or could it be that row at Taunton ?” and he lay awake half the night thinking of it ; for it was not only a puzzle, but there was a sort of suspicion of danger and he knew not what, throbbing in his soul whenever his reverie conjured up that impenetrable, white, seoffing face.

---

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN WHICH THE GENTLEMEN FOLLOW THE LADIES.

HAVING had as much claret as they cared for, the gentlemen fluttered gaily into the drawing-room, and Puddock, who made up to Miss Gertrude, and had just started afresh, and in a rather more sentimental vein, was a good deal scandalized and put out by the General's reciting, with jolly emphasis, and calling thereto his daughter's special attention his receipt for “surprising a weaver,” which he embellished with two or three burlesque improvements of his own, which Puddock, amidst his blushes and confusion, allowed to pass without a protest. Aunt Rebecca was the only person present who pointedly refused to laugh ; and with a slight shudder and momentary elevation of her eyes, said, “wicked and unnatural cruelty !” at which sentiment Puddock blew his nose in rather agitated manner.

“’Tis a thing I’ve never done myself—that is, I’ve never then it done,” said little Puddock, suffused with blushes, as he pleaded his cause at the bar of humanity—for those were the days of Howard, and the fair sex had taken up the philanthropist. "The—the—retheipt—'tis you see, a thing I happened to meet—and—and jutht read it in the—in a book—and the—I—a"—

Aunt Becky, with her shoulders raised in a shudder, and an agonized and peremptory "there, there, there," moved out of hearing in dignified disgust, to the General's high entertainment, who enjoyed her assaults upon innocent Puddock, and indeed took her attacks upon himself, when executed with moderation, hilariously enough—a misplaced good-humor which never failed to fire Aunt Becky's just resentment.

Indeed, the General was so tickled with this joke that he kept it going for the rest of the evening, by sly allusions and mischievous puns. As for instance, at supper, when Aunt Rebecca was deploring the miserable depression of the silk manufacture, and the distress of the poor Protestant artisans of the Liberty, the General, with a solemn wink at Puddock, and to that officer's terror, came out with—

"Yet, who knows, Lieutenant Puddock, but the weavers, poor fellows, may be surprised, you know, by a sudden order from the Court, as happened last year."

But Aunt Rebecca only raised her eyebrows, and, with a slight toss of her head, looked sternly at a cold fowl on the other side. But, from some cause or another—perhaps it was Miss Gertrude's rebellion in treating the outlawed Puddock with special civility that evening, Miss Becky's asperity seemed to acquire edge and venom as time proceeded. But Puddock rallied quickly. He was on the whole very happy, and did not grudge Mervyn his share of the talk, though he heard him ask leave to send Miss Gertrude Chatterworth a portfolio of his drawings made in Venice, to look over, which she, with a smile, accepted—and at supper, Puddock, at the General's instigation, gave them a solo, which went off pretty well, and, as they stood about the fire after it, on a similar pressure, an imitation of Barry in Othello; and upon this

Miss Becky, who was a furious partisan of Smock-alley and Mossop against Barry, Woodward, and the Crow-street play-house, went off again.

"Crow-street was set up," she harangued, "to ruin the old house in the spirit of covetousness, you say" (Puddock had not said a word on the subject); "well, covetousness, we have good authority for saying, is idolatry—nothing less—idolatry, sir—you need not stare." (Puddock certainly did stare.) "I suppose you once read your Bible, sir. But every sensible man, woman, child, and infant, sir, in the kingdom knows it was malice; and malice, Holy Writ says; is murder—but I forgot, that's perhaps no very great objection with Lieutenant Puddock," and she dropt a slight, scornful courtesy.

And little Puddock flushed up, and his round eyes grew rounder and rounder, as she proceeded, every moment; and he did not know what to say. Dumbfounded as he was, he took half of Lord Chesterfield's advice in such cases, that is, he forgot the smile, but he made a very low bow, and, with this submission, the combat [si rixa est] subsided.

Dangerfield had gone away some time—so had Mervyn—Sturk and his wife went next, and Cluffe and Puddock, who lingered as long as was decent, at last took leave. The plump Lieutenant went away very happy, notwithstanding the two or three little rubs he had met with, and a good deal more in love than ever. And he and his companion were both thoughtful, and the walk home was quite silent, though very pleasant.

Cluffe was giving shape mentally to his designs upon Miss Rebecca's £20,000 and savings. He knew she had had high offers in her young days, and refused; but those were passed and gone—and gray hairs bring wisdom—and women grow more practicable as the time for action dwindles—and she was just the woman to take a fancy—and "once the maggot bit," to go any honest length to make it fact. And Cluffe knew that he had the field to himself, and that he was a well made, handsome, agreeable officer—not so young as to make the thing absurd, yet young enough to inspire the right sort of feeling.

And the two warriors, side by side, marched over the bridge, in the star-light, and both, by common consent, halted silently, and wheeled up to the battlement; and Puddock puffed a complacent little sigh up the river toward Belmont; and Cluffe was a good deal interested in the subject of his contemplation, and in fact, the more he thought of it, the better he liked it.

And they stood, each in his reverie, looking over the battlement toward Belmont, and hearing the hushed singing of the river, and seeing nothing but the deep blue, and the stars, and the black outline of the trees that overhung the bridge, until the enamored Cluffe, who liked his comforts, and knew what gout was, felt the chill air, and remembered suddenly that they had stopped, and ought to be in motion toward their beds, and so he shook up Puddock, and they started anew, and parted just at the Phoenix, shaking hands heartily like two men who had just done a good stroke of business together.

---

CHAPTER XIX.

IN WHICH MR. DANGERFIELD VISITS THE CHURCH OF CHAPELIZOD, AND ZEKIEL IRONS GOES A-FISHING.

EARLY next morning Lord Castlemallard, Dangerfield, and Nutter rode into Chapelizod, plaguey dusty, and having already made the circuit of that portion of his property which lay west of the town. They had poked into the new mills and the old mills, and contemplated the quarries, and the limekilns, and talk with Doyle about his holding, and walked over the two vacant farms, and I know not all besides. And away trotted his lordship to his breakfast in town. And Dangerfield, seeing the church door open, dismounted and walked in, and Nutter did likewise.

Bob Martin was up in the gallery, I suppose, doing some good, and making a considerable knocking here and there in the pews, and walking slowly with creaking shoes. Zekiel Irons, the clerk, was down below about his business, at the communion table at the far end, lean, blue-chinned, thin-lipped, stooping over his quarto prayer books, and gliding about without noise, reverent and sinister. When they came in, Nutter led the way to Lord Castlemallard's pew, which brought them up pretty near to the spot where grave Mr. Irons was prowling serenely. The pew would soon want new flooring, Mr. Dangerfield thought, and the Castlemallard arms and supporters, a rather dingy piece of vainglory, overhanging the main seat on the wall, would be nothing the worse of a little fresh gilding and paint.

"There was a claim—eh—to one foot nine inches off the eastern end of the pew, on the part of—of the family—at Inchicore, I think they call it," said Dangerfield, laying his riding-whip like a rule along the top, to help his imagination—"Hey—that would spoil the pew."

"The claim's settled, and Mr. Langley goes to the other side of the aisle," said Nutter, nodding to Irons, who came up and laid his long clay-colored fingers on the top of the pew-door, and one long, thin foot on the first step, and with half-closed eyes, and a half bow, he awaited their pleasure.

"The Langley family had this pew," said Dangerfield, with a side nod to that next his lordship's.

"Yes, sir," said Irons, with the same immutable semblance of a smile, and raising neither his head nor his eyes.

"And who's got 'it now?"

"His reverence, Dr. Walsingham."

And so it came out, that having purchased Salmonfalls, the Rector had compromised the territorial war that was on the point of breaking out among his parishioners, by exchanging with that old coxcomb, Langley, the great square pew over the way, that belonged to that house, for the queer little crib in which the tenant of Inchicore had hitherto sat in state.

"Hey—let's see it," said Dangerfield, crossing the aisle, with Irons at his heels, for he was a man that saw everything for himself, that ever so remotely concerned him or his business.

"We buried Lord ——"(and the title he spoke very low) "in the vault here, just under where you stand, on Monday last, by night," said Irons, very gently and grimly, as he stood behind Dangerfield.

"Oh! indeed?" said Dangerfield, dryly, making a little nod, and raising his eyebrows, and just moving a little a one side—" 'Twas a nasty affair."

He looked up, with his hands in his breeches' pockets, and read a mural tablet, whistling scarce audibly the while. It was not reverent, but he was a gentleman; and the clerk standing behind him, retained his quiet posture, and that smile, that yet was not a smile but a sort of reflected light—was it patience, or was it secret ridicule?—you could not tell; and it never changed, and somehow it was provoking.

"And some persons, I believe, had an unpleasant duty to do there," said Dangerfield, abruptly, in the middle of his tune, and turning his spectacles fully and sternly on Mr. Irons.

The clerk's head bent lower, and he shook it; and his eyes, but for a little glitter through the eye-lashes seemed to close.

"'Tis a pretty church, this—a pretty town, and some good families in the neighborhood," said Dangerfield, briskly ; "and I dare say some trout in the river—hey ? the stream looks lively."

"Middling, only, poor gray troutlings, sir—not a soul cares to fish in it but myself," he answered.

"You're the clerk—eh ?"

"At your service, sir."

"Dublin man ?—or"—

"Born and bred in Dublin, your honor."

"Ay—well ! Irons—you've heard of Mr. Dangerfield, Lord Castlemallard's agent, I am he. Good morning, Irons ;" and he gave him half-a-crown, and he took another look round ; and then he and Nutter went out of the church, and took a hasty leave of one another, and away went Nutter on his nag, to the mills. And Dangerfield, just before mounting, popped into Cleary's shop, and in his grim, laconic way, asked the proprietor, among his meal-bags and bacon, about fifty questions in less than five minutes. "That was one of Lord Castlemallard's houses—eh—with the bad roof, and dunghill round the corner ?"—and, "Where's the pot-house they call the Salmon House ?—doing a good business, eh ?" and at last, "I'm told there's some trout in the stream. Is there any one in the town who knows the river, and could show me the fishing ? Oh, the clerk ! and what sort of fish is he, hey ? Oh ! an honest, worthy man, is he ? Very good, sir. Then, perhaps, Mr. a—perhaps, sir, you'll do me the favor to let one of your people run down to his house, and say Mr. Dangerfield, Lord Castlemallard's agent, would be much obliged if he would bring his rod and tackle, and take a walk with him up the river, for a little angling, at ten o'clock."

Jolly Phil Cleary was deferential, and almost nervous in his presence. The silver-haired, grim man, with his mysterious reputation for money, and that short, decisive way of his, and sudden cynical chuckle, inspired a sort of awe, which made his wishes, where expressed with that intent, very generally obeyed; and, sure enough, Irons appeared, with his rod, at the appointed hour, and the interesting anglers set out side by side on their ramble, in the true fraternity of the gentle craft.

The clerk had, I'm afraid, a shrew of a wife, shrill, vehement, and fluent. "Rogue," "old miser," "old sneak," and a great many worse names, she called him. Good Mrs. Irons was old, fat, and ugly, and she knew it; and that knowledge made her natural jealousy the fiercer. He had learned by long experience, the best tactique under fire: he became actually taciturn; or, if he spoke, his speech was laconic and enigmatical; sometimes throwing out a proverb, and sometimes a text; and sometimes, when provoked past endurance, spouting mildly a little bit of meek and venomous irony.

He loved his trout-rod and the devious banks of the Liffey, where saturnine and alone, he filled his basket. It was his helpmate's rule, whenever she did not know, to a certainty precisely, what Irons was doing, to take it for granted that he was about some mischief. Her lodger, Captain Devereux, was her great resource on these occasions, and few things pleased him better than a stormy visit from his hostess in this temper. The young scapegrace would close his novel, and set down his glass of sherry and water (it sometimes smelt very like brandy, I'm afraid). To hear her rant, one would have supposed, that her lank-haired, grimly partner was the prettiest youth in the county of Dublin; and Devereux, who had a vein of satire, and loved even farce, enjoyed the heroics of the fat old slut.

"Oh! what am I to do, Captain, jewel?" she bounced into the room, with flaming face and eyes swelled, and the end of her apron, with which she had been swobbing them, in her hand, while she gesticulated with her right; "there, he's off again to Island Bridge,—the owdacious sneak! It's all that dirty huzzy's doing. I'm not such a fool, but I don't know of his doings ; but I'll be even with you, Meg Partlet, yet, you trollop," and she shook her fat red fist in the air, at the presumed level of Meg's beautiful features.

"But suppose, madam," said the captain, "he has only gone up the river, and just taken his rod."

"Oh! rod, indeed. I know where he wants a rod, the rascal!"

"I tell you, madam," urged the chaplain, "you're quite in the wrong. You've discovered after twenty years' wedlock that your husband's a man! and you're vexed; would you have him anything else?"

"You're all in a story," she blubbered maniacally; "there's no justice, nor feeling, nor succour for a poor abused woman; but I'll do it, I will. I'll go to his reverence the Rev. Hugh Walsingham, Doctor of Divinity, and Rector of Chapelizod, and we'll see what he'll say;" and so she addressed herself to go.

"And when you see him, madam, ask the learned doctor of the parish; he'll tell you, that it hath prevailed among all the principal nations of antiquity, according to Pliny, Strabo, and the chief writers of antiquity; Juno, Dido, Eleanor Queen of England, and Mrs. Partridge, whom I read of here (and he pointed to the open volume of Tom Jones), each made, or thought she made, a like discovery." And the captain delivered this slowly, with knitted brow and thoughtful face, after the manner of the erudite and simple Doctor.

"Pretty partridges, indeed! and nice game for a parish clerk!" cried the lady, returning. "I wonder, so I do, when I look at him, and think of his goings on, how he can have the assurance to sit under the minister, and look the congregation in the face, and tune his throat, and sing the blessed psalms."

"You are not to wonder, madam ; believe the sage, who says omnibus hoc vitium est cantoribus."

Devereux knew of old that the effect of Latin on Mrs. Irons was to heighten the inflammation ; and so the matron burst into whole chapters of crimination, enlivened with a sprinkling of strong words, as the sages of the law love to pepper their indictments and informations with hot adverbs and well-spiced parentheses, "falsely," "scandalously," "maliciously," and suadente diabolo, to make them sit warm on the stomachs of a loyal judge and jury, and digest easily.

The neighbors were so accustomed to Mrs. Irons' griefs, that when her voice was audible, as upon such occasions it was, upon the high road and in the back gardens, it produced next to no sensation ; everybody had heard from that loud oracle every sort of story touching Irons which could well be imagined, and it was all so thoroughly published by the good lady, that curiosity on the subject was pretty well dead and gone, and her distant declamation rattled over their heads and boomed in their ears, like the distant guns and trumpets on a review day, signifying nothing.

As to Irons, if he was all that his wife gave out, he must have been a mighty sly dog indeed ; for, on the whole, he presented a tolerably decent exterior to society. It is said, indeed, that he liked a grave tumbler of punch, and was sardonic and silent in his liquor ; that his gait was occasionally a little queer and uncertain, as his lank figure glided home by moonlight, from the "Salmon House ;" and that his fingers fumbled longer than need be with the latch, and his tongue, though it tried but a short and grim "bar'th door, Marjry," or "gi' me can'le, wench," sometimes lacked its cunning, and slipped and kept not time. There were too, other scandals, such as the prying and profane love to shoot privily at church celebrities. Perhaps it was his reserve and sanctity that provoked them. Perhaps he was, in truth, though cautious, sometimes indiscreet

Just as Mrs. Irons whisked round for the seventh time to start upon her long threatened march to Dr. Walsingham's study to lay her pitiful case before him, Captain Devereux, who was looking toward the "Phoenix," saw the truant clerk and Mr. Dangerfield turn the corner together on their return.

"Stay, madam, here comes the traitor," said he; "and, on my honor, 'tis worse than we thought; for he has led my Lord Castlemallard's old agent into mischief too; and Meg Partlet has had two swains at her feet this morning; and, see, the hypocrites have got some trout in their basket, and their rods on their shoulders—and look, for all the world as if they had only been fishing—sly rogues!"

"Well it's all one," said Mrs. Irons, gaping from the other window, and sobering rapidly; "if 't isn't to-day, 'twill be to-morrow, I suppose; and at any rate 'tis a sin and a shame to leave any poor creature in this miserable taking, not knowing but he might be drowned; dear knows it would not be much trouble to tell his wife when the gentleman wanted him, and sure for any honest matter I'd never say against it."

---

CHAPTER XX.

RELATING AMONG OTHER THINGS HOW DOCTOR TOOLE WALKED UP TO THE TILED HOUSE; AND OF HIS PLEASANT DISCOURSE WITH MR. MERVYN.

DR. STURK's spirits and temper had not become more pleasant lately. He used to go into town oftener, and to stay there later; and his language about Toole and Nutter, when there was none but submissive little Mrs. Sturk by, was more fierce and coarse than ever. To hear him, then, one would have supposed that they were actually plotting to make away with him, and that in self-defence he must smite them hip and thigh. Then, beside their moral offensiveness, they were such "idiots," botching and blundering right and left, so palpably to the danger and ruin of their employers, that no man of conscience could sit easy and see it going on; and all this simply because he had fixed his affections upon the practice of the one, and the agency of the other. For Sturk had, in his own belief, a genius for business of every sort. Every body on whom his insolent glance fell, who had any sort of business to do, did it wrong, and was a "precious disciple," or a "goose," or a "born jack-ass," and excited his scoffing chuckle. And he was fond of just nibbling at speculations in a small safe way, and used to pull out a roll of bank-notes, when he was lucky, and show his winnings to his wife, and boast and rail, and tell her, if it was not for the cursed way his time was cut up with hospital, and field days, and such trumpery regimental duties he could make a fortune while other men were thinking of it; and he very nearly believed it. And he was, doubtless, clear-headed, though wrong-headed, too, at times, and very energetic; but his genius was for pushing men out of their places to make way for himself.

But with all that he had the good brute instincts too, and catered diligently for his brood, and their "dam"—and took a gruff unacknowledged pride in seeing his wife well dressed—and had a strong liking for her—and thanked her in his soul for looking after things so well; and thought often about his boys, and looked sharply after their education; and was an efficient and decisive head of a household; and had no vices nor expensive indulgences; and was a hard but tolerably just man to deal with.

All this time his uneasiness and puzzle about Dangerfield continued, and, along with other things, kept him awake often to unseasonable hours at night. He did not tell Mrs. Sturk. In fact, he was a man who, though on most occasions he gave the wife of his bosom what he called "his mind" freely enough, yet did not see fit to give her a great deal of his confidence.

Dangerfield had his plans too. Nothing could be more compact and modest than his household. He had just a housekeeper and two maids, who looked nearly as old, and a valet, and a groom, who slept at the "Phoenix," and two very pretty horses at livery in the same place. All his appointments were natty and complete, and his servants, every one, stood in awe of him; for no lip or eye service would go down with that severe, prompt, and lynx-eyed gentleman. And his groom, among the coachmen and other experts at the "Salmon House," used to brag of his hunters in England; and his man, of his riches, and his influence with Lord Castlemallard.

In England, Dangerfield, indeed, spent little more money than he did in Chapelizod, except in his stable; and Lord Castlemallard, who admired his stinginess, as he did everything else about him, used to say: "He's a wonder of the world! How he retains his influence over all the people he knows without ever giving one among them so much as a mutton-chop or a glass of sherry in his house, I can't conceive. I couldn't do it, I know." But he had ultimate plans, if not of splendor, at least of luxury. His tastes, and perhaps some deeper feelings, pointed to the continent, and he had purchased a little paradise on the Lake of Geneva, where was an Eden of fruits and flowers, and wealth of marbles and colored canvas, and wonderful wines maturing in his cellars, and aquaria for his fish, and ice-houses and baths, and I know not what refinements of old Roman Villaluxury beside—among which he meant to pass the honored evening of his days; with just a few more thousands, and, as he sometimes thought, perhaps a wife.

It is a maxim with charitable persons to assume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that every British subject is an honest man. Now, if we had gone to Lord Castlemallard for his character we know very well what we should have heard about Dangerfield; and, on the other hand, we have never found him out in a dirty action or unworthy thought; and, therefore, it leaves upon our mind an unpleasant impression about that Mr. Mervyn, who arrived in the dark, attending upon a coffin as mysterious as himself, and now lives solitarily in the haunted house near Ballyfermot, that the omniscient Dangerfield should follow him, when they passed upon the road, with that peculiar stern look of surprise which to say—"Was ever such audacity conceived! Is the man mad?"

But Dangerfield did not choose to talk about him, though the gentlemen at the Club pressed him often with questions, which, however, he quietly parried, to the signal vexation of active little Dr. Toole, who took up and dropped, in turn all sorts of curious theories about the young stranger. Lord Castlemallard knew all about him, too, but his lordship was high and huffy, and hardly ever in Chapelized except on horseback, and two or three times in the year at a grand dinner at the Artillery mess. And as for Dr. Walsingham, when he thought it right to hold his tongue upon a given matter, thumb-screws could not squeeze it from him.

In short, our friend Toole grew so feverish under his disappointment that he made an excuse of old Tim Molloy's toothache to go up in person to the "Tiled House," in the hope of meeting the young gentleman, and hearing something from him to alleviate his distress. And, sure enough, his luck stood him in stead; for, as he was going away, having pulled out old Molloy's grinder to give a color to his visit, who should he find upon the steps of the hall-door but the pale, handsome young gentleman himself.

Dr. Toole bowed low and grinned with real satisfaction.

reminded him of their interview at the "Phoenix," and made by way of apology for his appearance at the "Tiled House," a light and kindly allusion to poor old Tim. And finding that Mr. Mervyn was going toward Chapelizod, he begged him not to delay on his account, and accompanied him down the Ballyfermot road, entertaining him by the way with an inexhaustible affluence of Chapelizod anecdote and scandal, at which the young man stared a good deal, and sometimes even appeared impatient; but the Doctor did not perceive it, and rattled on; and told him moreover, everything about himself and his belongings with a minute and voluble frankness, intended to shame the suspicious reserve of the stranger. But nothing came; and being by this time growing bolder, he began a more direct assault, and told him with a proper scorn of the village curiosity, all the theories which the Chapelizod gossips had spun about him.

"And they say, among other things, that you're not—a—in fact—not legitimate," says Toole, in a tone implying pity and contempt for his idle townsfolk.

"They lie, then!" cried the young man, stopping short, more fiercely than was pleasant, and fixing his two great lurid eyes upon the cunning little face of the Doctor; and, after a pause, "Why can't they let me and my concerns alone, sir?"

"But there's no use in saying so, I can tell you," exclaimed little Toole, recovering his feet in an instant. "Why, I suppose there isn't so tattling, prying, lying scandalous a little colony of Christians on earth; eyes, ears, and mouths all open, sir; club talk, sir, talk over cards, talk at home, sir—talk in the streets—talk—talk; by Jupiter Tonans! 'tis enough to bother one's ears, and make a man envy Robinson Crusoe!"

"So I do, sir, if he were rid of his parrot," answered Mervyn; and with a dry "I wish you a good morning, Doctor—Doctor—a—sir”—turned sharply from him, up the Palmerstown-road.

“Going to Belmont,” murmured little Toole, with his face a little redder than usual, and stopping in an undignified way for a moment at the corner to look after him. “He’s close—plaguey close; and Miss Rebecca Chatterworth knows nothing about him neither—I wonder does she, though—and doesn’t seem to care, even. He’s not there for nothing, though. Some one makes him welcome, depend on’t,” and he winked to himself. “A plaguey high stomach, too, by Jove. I bet you fifty, if he stays here three months, he’ll be at swords or pistols with some of our hot-bloods. And whatever his secret is—and I dare say ’tisin’t worth knowing—the people here will feret it out at last, I warrant you. Secret, indeed!” and he whistled a bar or two contemptuously, which subsided into dejected silence, and he muttered, “I wish I knew it,” and walked over the bridge gloomily.

Now, for some reason or another, Dangerfield had watched the growing intimacy between Mervyn and Miss Gertrude Chatterworth with an evil eye. He certainly did know something about this Mr. Mervyn, with his beautiful sketches and his talk about Italy, and his fine music. And his own spectacles had carefully surveyed Miss Chatterworth, and she had passed the ordeal satisfactorily. And Dangerfield thought, “These people can’t possibly suspect the actual state of the case, and who and what this gentleman is to my certain knowledge; and ’tis a pity so fine a young lady should be sacrificed for want of a word spoken in season.”

CHAPTER XXI.

TELLING HOW MR. MERVYN FARED AT BELMONT, AND OF A PLEASANT LITTLE DEJEUNER BY THE MARGIN OF THE LIFFEY.

Now it happened that, on the very same day, the fashion of Dr. Walsingham's and of Aunt Rebecca's countenances were one and both changed towards Mr. Mervyn, much to his chagrin and puzzle. The Doctor, who met him near his own house by the bridge, was something distant in manner, and seemed sad, and as if he had something on his mind, and laid his hand upon the young man's arm, and addressed himself to speak; but glancing round his shoulder, and seeing people astir, and that they were under observation, he reserved himself.

That day both the ladies of Belmont looked as if they had heard some strange horror, each in her own way. Aunt Rebecca received the young man without a smile, and said some dry and sharp things, and looked as if she could say more, and colored menacingly, and, in short, was odd and very nearly impertinent. And Gertrude, though very gentle and kind, seemed also much graver, and looked pale, and altogether like a brave young lady who had fought a battle without crying. And Mervyn saw all this and pondered on it, and went away soon; the iron entered into his soul.

Coming out of church, Dr. Walsingham asked Mervyn to take a turn with him in the Park—and so they did—and the Doctor talked with him seriously and kindly on that broad plateau. The young man walked darkly behind him, and they often stopped outright. When, on their return, they came near the Chapelized gate, the Doctor was telling him that marriage is an affair of the heart—also a spiritual union—and, moreover, a mercantile partnership—and he insisted much upon this latter view. Dr. Walsingham had made a love-match, was the most imprudent and open-handed of men, and always preaching to others against his own besetting sin. To hear him talk, indeed, you'd have supposed he was a usurer. Then Mr. Mervyn, who looked a little pale and excited, turned the Doctor about, and they made another little circuit, while he entered somewhat into his affairs and prospects, and told him something about an appointment in connexion with the Embassy at Paris, and said he would ask him to read some letters about it; and the Doctor seemed a little shaken; and so they parted in a very friendly but grave way.

When Mervyn had turned his back upon Belmont, on the occasion of the unpleasant little visit I mentioned just now, the ladies had some words in the drawing-room.

"I have not coquetted, madam," said Miss Gertrude, haughtily.

"Then I'm to presume you've been serious; and I take the liberty to ask how far this affair has proceeded?" said Aunt Rebecca, firmly, and laying her gloved hand and folded fan calmly on the table.

"I really forget," said the young lady, coldly.

"Has he made a declaration of love?" demanded the Aunt, the two red spots on her cheeks coming out steadily, and helping the flash of her eyes.

"Certainly not," answered the young lady, with a stare of haughty surprise that was quite unaffected.

At the present luncheon and dance on the grass that the officers gave, in that pretty field by the river, half-a-dozen of the young people had got beside the little brook that runs simpering and romping into the river just there. Women are often good-natured in love matters where rivalry does not mix, and Miss Gertrude, all on a sudden, found herself alone with Mervyn. Aunt Becky, from under the ash trees at the other end of the field, with great distinctness, for she was not a bit near sighted, and considerable uneasiness, saw their tete-a tete. It was out of the question getting up in time to prevent the young people from speaking their minds if so disposed, and she thought she perceived that in the young man's bearing, which looked like a pleading and eagerness, and "Gertrude's put out a good deal—I see by her plucking at those flowers on the bank there—but my head to a china orange—the girl won't think of him. She's not a young woman to rush into a horrible folly, hand-over-head," thought Aunt Becky; and then she began to think they were talking very much at length indeed, and to regret that she had not started at once from her post for the place of meeting; and Aunt Becky began to grow wroth, and was on the point of marching upon them, when they began slowly to walk towards the group who were plucking bunches of woodbine from the hedge across the little stream, at the risk of tumbling in, and distributing the flowers among the ladies, amidst a great deal of laughing and gabble. Then Miss Gertrude made Mr. Mervyn rather a haughty and slight salutation her Aunt thought, and so dismissed him; he, too, makes a bow, but a very low one, and walks straight off to the first lady he sees.

This happened to be mild little Mrs. Sturk, and he talked a good deal to her, but restlessly, and, as it seemed, with a wandering mind; and afterwards he conversed, with an affectation of interest—Aunt Becky thought—for a few minutes with Lillias Walsingham; and afterwards he talked with an effort, and so much animation and such good acceptance, to the fair Magnolia, that O'Flaherty had serious thoughts of horse-whipping him when the festivities were over—for, as he proposed informing him, his "ungentlemanlike interference."

"He has got his quietus," thought Aunt Becky, with triumph; "this brisk, laughing carriage, and heightened color, a woman of experience can see through at a glance."

Then came her niece, cold and stately, with steady eye and a slight flush, and altogether the air of the conscientious young matron who has returned from the nursery, having there administered the discipline; and so she sat down beside her aunt, serene and silent, and the little glow passed away, pale and still.

"Well, he has spoken?" said her aunt to her, in a sharp aside.

"Yes," answered the young lady, icily.

"And has had his answer?"

"Yes—and I beg, Aunt Rebecca, the subject may be allowed to drop." The young lady's eyes encountered her aunt's so directly, and were so fully charged with the genuine Chatterworth lightning, that Miss Rebecca, unused to such demonstrations, averted hers, and with a slight sarcastic inclination, and, "Oh! your servant, young lady," beckoned with her fan grandly to little Puddock, who was hovering with other designs in the vicinity, and taking his arm, though he was not forgiven, but only employed, marched to the marquee, where, it was soon evident, the plump Lieutenant was busy in commending, according to their merits, the best bits of the best plats on the table.

"So dear Aunt Becky has forgiven Puddock," says Devèreux, who was sauntering up the tent between O'Flaherty and Cluffe, and little suspecting that he was descanting upon the intended Mrs. Cluffe—"and they are celebrating the reconciliation over a jelly and a pupton. I love Aunt Rebecca, I tell you—I don't know what we should do without her. She's impertinent, and often nearly insupportable; but isn't she the most placable creature on earth? And she really does princely things—doesn't she? She set up that ugly widow—what's her name?—twice in a shop in Dame-street, and gave two hundred pounds to poor Scamper's orphan, and never looks for thanks or compliments, or upbraids his ingrates with past kindnesses. She's noble—Aunt Becky's every inch a gentleman!"

By this time they had reached the tent, and the hearty voice of the General challenged them from the shade, as he fillipped a little chime merrily on his empty glass.

---

CHAPTER XXII.

WHICH CONCERNS THE GRAND DINNER AT THE KING'S HOUSE, AND WHO WERE THERE.

It was about this time that the dinner party at the King's House came off. Old Colonel and Mrs. Stafford were hospitable, and liked to bring their neighbors together, without ceremony, round a saddle of mutton and gooseberry pie, and other such solid comforts; and then, hey for a round game!—for the young people; Pope Joan, or what you please, in the drawing-room. But twice or thrice in the year the worthy couple made a more imposing gathering at the King's House, and killed the fatted calf, and made a solemn feast to the big-wigs and the notables of Chapelizod, with just such a sprinkling of youngsters as sufficed to keep alive the young people who they brought in their train.

Dinner was a five o'clock affair in those days, and the state parlor was well filled. There was old Bligh from the Magazine, and the Chatterworths, and the Walsinghams; and old Dowager Lady Glenvarloch—Colonel Stafford's cousin—who flashed out in the evening sun from Dublin in thunder and dust and her carriage-and-four, bringing her mild little country niece, who spoke sparingly, and ate with diffidence, and Captain Devereux was there; and the next beau who appeared was—of all men in the world—Mr. Mervyn! And Aunt Becky watched, and saw with satisfaction, that he and Gertrude met as formally and coldly as she could have desired. And then there was an elaborate macaroni, one of the Lord Lieutenant's household,—Mr. Beauchamp; and last, Lord Castlemallard, who liked very well to be the chief man in the room, and dozed after dinner serenely in that consciousness, and loved to lean back upon his sofa in the drawing-room, and gaze in a dozing, smiling, Turkish reverie, after Gertrude Chatterworth and pretty Lillias, whom he admired; and when either came near enough, he would take her hand and say—"Well, child, how do you do?—and why don't you speak to your old friend? You charming rogue, you know I remember you no bigger than your fan. And what mischief have you been about—eh? What mischief have you been about, I say, young gentlewoman? Turning all the pretty fellows' heads, I warrant you—eh!—turning their heads?"

Devereux could not help seeing pretty Lillias over the way, who was listening to handsome Mervyn, as it seemed, with interest, and talking also her pleasant little share. He was no dunce, that Mervyn, nor much of a coxcomb, and certainly no clown, Devereux thought, but as fine a gentleman, to speak honestly, and as handsome, as well dressed, and as pleasant to listen to, with that sweet low voice and piquant smile, as any. Besides he could draw, and had more yards of French and English verses by rote than Aunt Becky owned of Venetian lace and satin ribbons, and was more of a scholar than he. He? He!—why—"he?" what the deuce had Devereux to do with it—was he vexed?—A fiddlestick! He began to flag with Miss Ward, the dowager's niece, and was glad when the refined Beauchamp, at her other side, took her up, and entertained her with Lady Carrickmore's ball and the masquerade, and the last levee, and with the drawingroom. There are said to have been persons who could attend to half a dozen different conversations going on together, and take a rational part in them all, and indulge, all the time, in a distinct consecutive train of thought beside. But Devereux was not by any means competent to the feat, though there was one conversation, perhaps the thread of which he would gladly have caught up and disentangled. So the talk at top and bottom and both sides of the table, with its cross-readings, and muddle, and uproar, changed hands, and whisked and rioted, like a dance of Walpurgis, in his lonely brain.

All this did not make him much wiser or merrier. Love has its fevers, its recoveries, and its relapses. The patient may believe the malady quite cured—the passion burnt out—the flame extinct—when a little chance puff of rivalry blows the white ashes off, and, lo! the old liking is still smouldering. But this was not Devereux's case. He remembered when his fever—not a love one—and his leave of absence at Scarborough, and that long continental tour of hers with Aunt Rebecca and Gertrude Chatterworth, had carried the grave, large-eyed little girl away, and hid her from his sight for more than a year, very nearly two years, the strange sort of thrill and surprise with which he saw her again—tall and slight, and very beautiful—no, not beautiful, perhaps, if you go to rule and compass; but there was an indescribable prettiness in all her features, and movements, and looks, higher, and finer, and sweeter than all the canons of statuary will give you.

How prettily she stands! how prettily she walks! what a sensitive, spirited, clear-tinted face it is! This was pretty much the interpretation of his reverie, as Colonel Strafford's large and respectable party obligingly vanished for a while into air. Is it sad? I think it is sad—I don't know—and how sweetly and how drolly it lighted up; at that moment he saw her smile, the pleasant mischief in it—and then all earnest again, and still so animated! What feminine intelligence and character there is in that face !—'tis pleasanter to me than conversation, 'tis a fairy tale, or—or a dream, it's so interesting, I never know, you see, what's coming. Is not it wonderful ?

Devereux's contemplation of the animated tete-a-tete, for such, in effect, it seemed to him at the other side of the table, was, however, by no means altogether pleasurable. He began to think Mervyn conceited, there was a "provoking probability of success" about him, and altogether something that was beginning to grow offensive and odious.

"She knows well enough I like her," so his liking said in confidence to his vanity, and even he hardly overheard them talk : "better a great deal than I knew it myself, till old Strafford got together this confounded stupid dinner-party (he caught Miss Chatterworth glancing at him with a peculiar look of inquiry). Why the plague did he ask me here ? it was Puddock's turn, and he likes vension and compots, and—and—but 'tis like them—the women fall in love with the man who's in love with himself, like Narcissus yonder—and they can't help it—not they—and what care I ?—hang it ! I say, what is't to me ?—and yet—if she were to leave it—what a queer, unmeaning place Chapelized would be !"

"And what do you say to that, Captain Devereux ?" cried the hearty voice of old General Chatterworth, and, with a little shock, the Captain dropped from the clouds into his chair, and a clear view of the larded fowl before him, and his own responsibilities and situation—

"Some turkey !" he said, awaking, and touching the carving-knife and fork, with a smile and a bow ; and he mingled once more in the business and bustle of life.

---

CHAPTER XXIII.

IN WHICH TWO YOUNG PEOPLE UNDERSTAND ONE ANOTHER BETTER, PERHAPS, THAN EVER THEY DID BEFORE, WITHOUT SAYING SO.

AND now the ladies, with their gay plumage, have flown away like foreign birds of passage, and the jolly old priests of Bacchus, in the parlor, make their libations of claret; and the young fellows after a while, seeing a-gathering of painted fans, and rustling hoops, and fluttering laces, upon the lawn, and a large immigration of hilarious neighbors besides, and two serious fiddlers, and a black fellow with a tambourine preparing for action, and the warm glitter of the western sun among the green foliage about the window, could stand it no longer, but stole away, to join the merry muster.

"The young bucks will leave their claret," said Lord Castlemallard; "and truly 'tis a rare fine wine, Colonel, a mighty choice claret truly (and the Colonel bowed low, and smiled a rugged purple smile in spite of himself, for his claret was choice), all won't do when Venus beckons—when she beckons—ha, ha—all won't do, sir—at the first flutter of a petticoat, and the invitation of a pair of fine eyes—fine eyes, Colonel—by Jupiter, they're off—you can't keep 'em—I say your wine won't keep 'em—'twas once so with us—eh, General?—ha! ha!—and we must forgive 'em now.' And he shoved round his chair lazily, with a left-backward wheel, so as to command the window, for he liked to see the girls dance, the little rogues!

Aunt Becky and Lilly Were chatting under those pollard ozers by the river. She was always gentle with Lilly, and when Lilly told a diverting little story—and she was often very diverting—Aunt Becky used to watch her pleasant face, with such a droll, good natured smile; and she used to pat her on the cheek, and look so glad to see her when she met, and often as if she would say—“I admire you a great deal more, and am a great deal fonder of you than you think; but you know brave stoical Aunt Becky can’t say all that—it would not be in character, you know.” And the old lady knew how good she was to the poor, and she liked her spirit and candor, and honor, it was so uncommon, and somehow angelic, she thought.

I think Devereux liked her for liking Lilly—he thought it was for her own sake. Of course, he was often unexpectedly set upon and tomahawked by the impetuous lady; but the gay Captain put on his scalp again, and gathered his limbs together, and got up in high good-humor, and they were never the worse friends.

So, turning his back upon the fiddles and tambourine, Gipsy Devereux saunters down to the river-bank, and to the ozers, where the ladies are looking down the river, and a blue bell, not half so blue as her own deep eyes, in Lillias’s fingers; and the sound of their gay talk came mixed with the twitter and clear evening songs of the small birds. By those same ozers, that see so many things, and tell no tales, there will yet be a parting. But its own sorrow suffices to the day. And now it is a summer sunset, and all around dappled gold and azure, and sweet, dreamy sounds; and Lillias turns her pretty head, and sees him;—and oh! was it fancy, or did he see just a little flushing of the color on her cheek—and her lashes seemed to drop a little, and out came her frank little hand. And Devereux leaned on the paling there, and chatted his best sense and nonsense, I dare say; and they laughed and talked about all sorts of things; and he sang for them a queer little snatch of a ballad, of an enamored Captain, the course of whose true love ran not smooth :—

The river ran between them;
 And she looked upon the stream,
 And the soldier looked upon her
 As a dreamer on a dream.
 "Believe me—oh ! believe,"
 He sighed, "you peerless maid;
 My honor is pure,
 And my true love sure,
 Like the white plume in my hat,
 And my shining blade."

The river ran between them,
 And she smiled upon the stream,
 Like one that smiles at folly—
 A dreamer on a dream.
 "I do not trust your promise,
 I will not be betrayed;
 For your faith is light,
 And your cold wit bright,
 Like the white plume in your hat,
 And your shining blade."

The river ran between them,
 And he rode beside the stream,
 And he turned away and parted,
 As a dreamer from his dream.
 And his comrade brought his message
 From the field where he was laid—
 Just his name to repeat,
 And to lay at her feet
 The white plume from his hat
 And his shining blade.

And he sang it with a tuneful and plaintive tenor, that had power to make rude and ridiculous things pathetic; and Aunt Rebecca thought he was altogether very agreeable. But it was time she should see what Miss Gertrude was about; and Devereux and Lily were such very old friends that she left them to their devices.

"I like the river," says he; "it has a soul, Miss Lily, and a character. There are no river gods, but nymphs.

Look at that river, Miss Liliās ; what a girlish spirit. I wish she would reveal herself ; I could lose my heart to her, I believe—if, indeed, I could be in love with anything, you know. Look at the river—is not it feminine ? it's sad and it's merry, musical and sparkling—and oh, so deep ! Always changing, yet still the same. 'Twill show you the trees, or the clouds, or yourself, or the stars ; and it's so clear and so dark, and so sunny, and—so cold. It tells everything, and yet nothing. I sometimes think, Miss Liliās, I've seen this river spirit ; and she's like—very like you !"

And so he went on ; and she was more silent and more a listener than usual. I don't know all that was passing in pretty Liliās's fancy—in her heart—near the hum of the waters and the spell of that musical voice. Love speaks in allegories and a language of signs ; looks and tones tell his tale most truly. So Devereux's talk held her for a while in a sort of trance, melancholy and delightful. There must be, of course, the affinity—the rapport—the what you please to call it—to begin with—it matters not how faint and slender ; and then the spell steals on and grows. I must not be mistaken, though, for Devereux's talk was only a tender sort of trifling, and Liliās had said nothing to encourage him to risk more ; but she now felt sure that Devereux liked her—that, indeed, he took a deep interest in her—and somehow she was happy.

And little Lily drew towards the dancers, and Devereux by her side—not to join in the frolic ; it was much pleasanter talking. But the merry thrum and gingle of the tambourine, and vivacious squeak of the fiddles, and the incessant laughter and prattle of the gay company, were a sort of protection. And perhaps she fancied that within that pleasant and bustling circle, the discourse, which was to her so charming, might be longer maintained. It was music heard in a dream—strange and sweet—and might never be heard again.

CHAPTER XXIV.

IN WHICH THE SUN SETS, AND THE MERRY-MAKING IS KEPT UP BY CANDLE-LIGHT IN THE KING'S HOUSE, AND LILY RECEIVES A WARNING WHICH SHE DOES NOT COMPREHEND.

DR. TOOLE, was this evening at the "King's House," of course, as usual, with his eyes about him and his tongue busy; and at this moment he was setting Cluffe right about Devereux's relation to the title and estates of Athenry. His uncle Roland Lord Athenry was, as everybody knew, a lunatic—Toole used to call him Orlando Furioso; and Lewis, his first cousin by his father's elder brother—the heir presumptive—was very little better, and reported every winter to be dying. He spends all his time—his spine being made, it is popularly believed, of gristle—stretched on his back upon a deal board, cutting out paper figures with a pair of scissors. Toole used to tell them at the Club, when alarming letters arrived about the health of the noble uncle and his hopeful nephew—the heir apparent—"That's the gentleman whose backbone's made of jelly—eh, Puddock? Two letters come, by Jove, announcing that Dick Devereux's benefit is actually fixed for the Christmas holidays, when his cousin undertakes to die for positively the last time, and his uncle will play in the most natural manner conceivable, the last act of 'King Lear.' " In fact, this family calamity was rather a cheerful subject among Devereux's friends; and certainly Devereux had no reason to love that vicious, selfish old lunatic, Lord Athenry, who, in his prodigal and heartless reign, before straw and darkness swallowed him, never gave the boy a kind word or a gentle look.

When Aunt Rebecca rustled into the ring that was gathered round about the fiddles and tamborine, she passed Miss Magnolia very near, with no more recognition than the tragedy queen bestows upon the painted statue on the wing by which she enters. And Miss Mag followed her with a titter and an angry flash of her eyes. So Aunt Rebecca made up to the little hillock—little bigger than a good tea-cake—on which the Dowager was perched in a high-backed chair, smiling over the dancers with a splendid benignity and beating time with her fat short foot. And Aunt Becky told Mrs. Colonel Strafford, standing by, she had extemporized a living Watteau, and indeed it was a very pretty picture, or Aunt Becky would not have said so; and “craning” from this eminence she saw her niece coming leisurely round, not in company of Mervyn.

That interesting stranger, on the contrary, had by this time joined Lilius and Devereux, who had returned toward the dancers, and was talking again with Miss Walsingham. Gertrude’s beau was little Puddock, who was all radiant and supremely blest. But encountering rather a black look from Aunt Becky as they drew near, he deferentially surrendered the young lady to the care of her natural guardian, who forthwith presented her to the Dowager; and Puddock warned off by another glance, backed away, and fell, unawares, helplessly, into the possession of Miss Magnolia, a lady whom he never quite understood, and whom he regarded with a very kind and polite sort of horror.

So the athletic Magnolia instantly impounded the little Lieutenant, and began to rally him, in the sort of slang she delighted in, with plenty of merriment and malice upon his tendre for Miss Chatterworth, and made the gallant young gentleman blush and occasionally smile, and bow a great deal, and take some snuff.

"And here comes the Duchess of Belmont again," said the saucy Miss Magnolia, seeing the stately approach of Aunt Becky, as it seemed to Puddock, through the back of her head. I think the exertion and frolic of the dance had got her high blood up to a sparkling state and her scorn and hate of Aunt Rebecca was more demonstrative than usual. "Now you'll see how she'll run against poor little simple me, just because I'm small. And this is the way they dance it," cried she, in a louder tone; and capering backward with a bounce, and an air, and a grace, she came with a sort of a courtesy, and a smart bump, and a shock against the stately Miss Rebecca; and whisking round with a little scream and a look of terrified innocence, and with her fingers to her heart, to suppress an imaginary palpitation, drops a low courtesy, crying—

"I'm blest but I thought 'twas tall Burke, the gunner."

"You might look behind you before you spring backward, young gentlewoman," says Aunt Becky, with a very bright color.

"And you might look before you before you spring forward, old gentlewoman," replies Miss Mag, just as angry.

"Young ladies used to have a respect to decorum," Aunt Becky goes on.

"So they prayed me to tell you, madam," replied the young lady, with a very meek courtesy, and a very crimson face.

"Yes, Miss Mac—Mag—madam—it used to be so," rejoins Aunt Rebecca, "'twas part of my education, at least, to conduct myself in a polite company like a civilized person."

"'I wish I could see it,' says blind Hugh;" Magnolia retorts, "but 'twas a good while ago, madam, and you've had time to forget."

"Oh, this is Lieutenant Puddock," said Aunt Becky, drawing off in high disdain, "the bully of the town. Your present company, sir, will find very pretty work, I warrant, for your sword and pistols; Sir Launcelot and his belle!"

"Do you like a belle or beldame best, Sir Launcelot?" inquired Miss Mag, with a mild little duck to Puddock.

"You'll have your hands pretty full, sir, ha, ha, ha!" and with scarlet cheeks, and a choking laugh, away sailed Aunt Rebecca.

"Choak chicken, there's more a-hatching," says Miss Mag in a sort of aside, and cutting a flie-flac with a merry devilish laugh, and a wink to Puddock. That officer, being a gentleman, was a good deal disconcerted, and scandalized—too literal to see, and too honest to enjoy, the absurd side of the combat.

'Twas an affair of a few seconds, like two frigates crossing in a gale, with only opportunity for a broadside or two; and, when the Rebecca Chatterworth sheered off, it can't be denied, her tackling was a good deal more out up, and her hull considerably more pierced than the saucy Magnolia, who sent that whistling shot and provoking cheer in her majestic wake.

"I see you want to go, Lieutenant Puddock. Lieutenant O'Flaherty, I promised to dance this country dance with you; don't let me keep you, Ensign Puddock," says Miss Mag, in a huff, observing little Puddock's wandering eye and thoughts.

"I—a—you see, Miss Macnamara, truly you were so hard upon poor Miss Rebecca Chatterworth, that I fear I shall get into trouble, unless I go and make peace with her," lisped the little Lieutenant, speaking the truth, as was his wont, with a bow and a polite smile, and a gentle indication of begining to move away.

"You had better go back to her at once if she wants you for if you don't with a good grace, she'll very like come and take you back by the collar," and Miss Mag and O'Flaherty joined in a ~~desisive~~ hee-haw ! to Puddock's considerable confusion, who bowed and smiled again, and tried to laugh, till the charming couple relieved him by taking their places in the dance.

And now the sun went down behind the tufted trees, and the blue shades of evening began to deepen, and the merry company flocked into the King's House, to dance again and to drink tea, and make more love, and play round games, and joke, and sing songs, and eat supper under old Colonel Strafford's snug and kindly roof-tree.

Dangerfield, who arrived rather late, was now in high chat with Aunt Becky. She rather liked him, and had very graciously accepted a gray parrot and a monkey, which he had deferentially presented, a step which called forth, to General Chatterworth's consternation, a cockatoo from Cluffe, who felt the necessity of maintaining his ground against the stranger, and wrote off by the next packet to London, in a confounded passion, for he hated wasting money, about a pelican he had got wind of. Dangerfield also entered with much apparent interest into a favorite scheme of Aunt Becky's, for establishing, between Chapelizod and Knockmaroon, a sort of retreat for discharged gaol-birds of her selection, a colony, happily for the character and silver spoons of the neighbourhood, never eventually established.

It was plain he was playing the frank, good fellow, and aiming at popularity. He had become one of the Club. He played at whist, and only smiled, after his sort, when his partner revoked, and he lost like a gentleman. His talk was brisk, and hard, and caustic—that of a Philistine who had seen the world and knew it. He had the Peerage by rote, and knew something out-of-the-way, amusing or damnable about every person of note you could name ; and his shrewd gossip had a bouquet its own, and a fine cynical flavor which secretly awed and delighted the young fellows. He smiled a good deal. He would laugh, too, occasionally ; but his laugh was not rich and joyous, like General Chatterworth's, or even Tom Toole's cozy chuckle, or old Doctor Walsingham's hilarious ha-ha-ha ! He did not know it ; but there was a cold hard ring in it, like the crash and jingle of broken glass. Then his spectacles, shining like ice in the light, never removed for a moment—never even pushed up to his forehead—heightened that sense of mystery and mask which seemed to challenge curiosity and defy scrutiny with a scornful chuckle.

In the meantime, the mirth, and frolic, and flirtation were drawing to a close. The dowager, in high good-humor, was conveyed down stairs to her carriage by Colonel Strafford and Lord Castlemallard, and rolled away, with flaming flambeaux, like a meteor, into town. There was a breaking-up and leave-taking, and parting jokes on the door-steps ; and as the ladies, old and young, were popping on their mantles in the little room of the hall, and Aunt Becky and Mrs. Colonel Strafford were exchanging a little bit of eager farewell gossip beside the cabinet, Gertrude Chatterworth—by some chance she and Lillias had not had an opportunity of speaking that evening—drew close to her, and she took her hand and said " Good night, dear Lily," and glanced over her shoulder, still holding Lily's hand ; and she looked very pale and earnest, and said quickly, in a whisper :

" Lily, darling, if you knew what I can tell you, if I dare, about Mr. Mervyn, you would cut your hand off rather than allow him to talk to you, as, I confess, he has talked to me, as an admirer, and knowing what I know, and with my eye upon him—Lily—Lily—I've been amazed by him to night. I can only warn you now, darling, to beware of a great danger."

" 'Tis no danger, however, to me, Gertrude dear," said Lily, with a pleasant little smile. " And though he's handsome, there's something, is there not, funeste in his deep eyes and black hair ; and the dear old man knows something strange about him, too ; I suppose 'tis all the same story."

" And he has not told you," said Gertrude, looking down with a gloomy face, at her fan.

" No ; but I'm so curious, I know he will, though he does not like to speak of it ; but you know, Gerty, I love a horror and I know the story's fearful, and I feel uncertain whether he's a man or a ghost ; but, see, Aunt Rebecca and Mistress Strafford are kissing."

" Good night, dear Lily, and remember !" said pale Gertrude without a smile, looking at her, for a moment, with a steadfast gaze, and then kissing her with a hasty and earnest pressure. And Lily kissed her again, and so they parted.

---

CHAPTER XXV.

RELATING HOW THE BAND OF THE ROYAL IRISH ARTILLERY PLAYED, AND, WHILE THE MUSIC WAS GOING ON, HOW VARIOUSLY DIFFERENT PEOPLE WERE MOVED.

TWICE a week the band of the Royal Irish Artillery regaled all comers with their music on the parade-ground by the river ; and, as it was reputed the best in Ireland, and Chapelized was a fashionable resort, people liked to drive out of town on a fine autumn day like this, by way of listening, and all the neighbors showed there, and there was quite a little fair for an hour or two.

Mervyn, among the rest, was there, but for scarce ten minutes, and, as usual, received little more than a distant salutation, coldly and gravely returned, from Gertrude Chatterworth, to whom Mr. Beauchamp, whom she remembered at the Straffords' dinner, addicted himself a good deal. That demigod appeared in white surtout, with a crimson cape, a French waistcoat, his hair en papillote, a feather in his hat, a couteau de chasse by his side, with a small cane hanging to his button, and a pair of Italian greyhounds at his heels. Little Puddock, too, was hovering near, and his wooing made uncomfortable by Aunt Becky's renewed severity, as well as by the splendor of "Mr. Redheels," who was expending his small talk and fleurrets upon Gertrude. Cluffe, moreover, who was pretty well in favor with Aunt Rebecca, and had been happy and prosperous, had his little jealousies too to plague him, for Dangerfield, with his fishing-rod and basket, no sooner looked in, with his stern front and remarkable smile, than Aunt Becky, seeming instantaneously to forget Captain Cluffe, and all his winning ways, left him abruptly, and walked up to the grim pescator del onda, with an outstretched hand, and a smile of encouragement, and immediately fell into confidential talk with him.

Aunt Becky led him a little walk twice or thrice up and down. She seemed grave, earnest and lofty, and he grinned and chatted after his wont energetically, to stout Captain Cluffe's considerable uneasiness and mortification. He had seen Dangerfield the day before, through his field-glass, from the high wooded grounds in the park, across the river, walk slowly for a good while under the poplars in the meadow at Belmont, beside Aunt Becky, in high chat; and there was something particular and earnest in their manner, which made him uncomfortable then. And fat Captain Cluffe's gall rose and nearly choked him, and he cursed Dangerfield in the bottom of his corpulent, greedy soul, and wondered what fiend had sent that scheming old land-agent three hundred miles out of his way, on purpose to interfere with his little interests, as if there were not plenty of—of—well!—rich old women—in London. And he bethought him of the price of the cockatoo and the probable cost of the pelican, rejoinders to Dangerfield's contributions to Aunt Rebecca's menagerie, for those birds were not to be had for nothing; and Cluffe, who loved money as well, at least, as any man in his majesty's service, would have seen the two tribes as extinct as the dodo, before he would have expended sixpence upon such tom-foolery, had it not been for Dangerfield's investments in animated nature. "The hound! as if two could not play at that game." But he had an uneasy and bitter presentiment that there were birds of paradise, and fifty other cursed birds beside, and that in this costly competition Dangerfield could take a flight beyond and above him; and he thought of the flagitious waste of money, and cursed him for a fool again. Aunt Becky had said, he thought, something in which "to-morrow" occurred, on taking leave of Dangerfield. "To-morrow!" What to-morrow? She spoke low and confidentially, and seemed excited and a little flushed, and very distraite when she came back. Altogether, he felt as if Aunt Rebecca was slipping through his fingers, and would have liked to take that selfish old puppy, Dangerfield, by the neck and drown him out of hand into the river. But, notwithstanding the state of his temper, he knew it might be his only chance to shine pre-eminently at that moment in amiability, wit, grace, and gallantry, and, though it was uphill work, he did labor uncommonly.

When Mr. Dangerfield's spectacles gleamed through the crowd upon Dr. Sturk, who was thinking of other things beside the music, the angler walked round forthwith, and accosted that universal genius. Mrs. Sturk felt the Doctor's arm, on which she leaned, vibrate for a second with a slight thrill—an evidence in that hard, fibrous limb of what she used to call "a start"—and she heard Dangerfield's voice over his shoulder. And the Surgeon and the Grand Vizier were soon deep in talk, and Sturk brightened up, and looked eager and sagacious, and important, and became very voluble, and impressive, and, leaving his lady to her own devices, with her maid and children, he got to the other side of the street, where Nutter, with taciturn and black observation saw them busy pointing with cane and finger and talking briskly as they surveyed together Dick Fisher's and Tom Tresham's tenements, and the Salmon House; and then beheld them ascend the steps of Tresham's door, and overlook the wall on the other side towards the river, and point this way and that along the near bank, as it seemed to Nutter discussing detailed schemes of alteration and improvement. Sturk actually pulled out his pocket-book and pencil, and then Dangerfield took the pencil, and made notes of what he read to him, on the back of a letter; and Sturk looked eager and elated, and Dangerfield frowned and looked impressed, and nodded again and again. Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis, under his very nose—he unconsulted! It was such an impertinence as Nutter could ill digest. It was a studied slight, something like a public deposition, and Nutter's jealous soul seethed secretly in a hell-broth of rage and suspicion.

I mentioned that Mistress Sturk felt in that physician's arm the telegraphic thrill with which the brain will occasionally send an invisible message of alarm from the seat of government to the extremities; and as this smallest of all small bits of domestic gossip did innocently escape me, the idle and good-natured reader will, I hope, let me say out my little say upon the matter, in the next chapter.

---

CHAPTER XXVI.

CONCERNING THE TROUBLES AND THE SHAPES THAT BEGAN TO GATHER ABOUT DOCTOR STURK.

IT was just about that time that our friend, Dr. Sturk, had two or three odd dreams that secretly acted disagreeably upon his spirits. His liver he thought was a little wrong, and there was certainly a little light gout sporting about him. His favorite "pupton" at mess, disagreed with him; so did his claret, and hot suppers as often as he tried them, and that was, more or less, nearly every night in the week. So he was, perhaps, right in ascribing these his visions to the humors, the spleen, the liver, and the juices. Still they sat uncomfortably upon his memory, and helped his spirits down, and made him silent and testy, and more than usually formidable to poor, little, quiet, hard-worked Mrs. Sturk.

There was an ugly and ominous consistency in these dreams which might have made a less dyspeptic man a little nervous. Tom Dunstan, a sergeant whom Sturk had prosecuted and degraded before a court-martial, who owed the Doctor no good will, and was dead and buried in the churchyard close by, six years ago, and whom Sturk had never thought about in the interval—made a kind of insurrection now, and was with him every night, figuring in these dreary visions, and somehow in league with a sort of conspirator-in-chief, who never shewed distinctly, but talked in scoffing menaces from outside the door, or clutched him by the throat from behind his chair, and yelled some hideous secret into his ear, which his scared and scattered wits, when he started into consciousness, could never collect again. And this fellow, with whose sneering cavernous talk—with whose very knock at the door or thump at the partition-wall he was as familiar as with his own wife's voice, and the touch of whose cold convulsive hand he had felt so often on his cheek or throat, and the very suspicion of whose approach made him faint with horror, his dreams would not present to his sight. There was always something interposed, or he stole behind him, or just as he was entering and the door swinging open, Sturk would awake—and he never saw him, at least in a human shape.

But one night he thought he saw, as it were, his sign or symbol. As Sturk lay his length under the bed-clothes, with his back turned upon his slumbering helpmate, he was, in the spirit, sitting perpendicularly in his great balloon-backed chair, at his writing table, in the window of the back one-pair-of-stairs chamber which he called his library, where he sometimes wrote prescriptions, and pondering over the other arabesque and astrological symbols of his mystery, he looked over his pen into the church-yard, which inspiring prospect he thence commanded.

Thus, as out of the body sat our recumbent Doctor in the room underneath the bed in which his snoring idolon lay, Tom Dunstan stood beside the table, with the short white threads sticking out on his blue sleeve, where the stitching of the stripes had been cut through on that twilight parade morning when the Doctor triumphed, and Tom's rank, fortune, and castles in the air, all tumbled together in the dust of the barrack pavement; and so, with his thin features and evil eye turned sideways to Sturk, says he, with a stiff salute—"A gentleman, sir, that means to dine with you," and there was the muffled knock at the door which he knew so well, and a rustling behind him. So the Doctor turned him about quickly with a sort of chill between his shoulders, and perched on the back of his chair sat a portentous old quizzical carrion-crow, the antediluvian progenitor of the whole race of carrion-crows, monstrous, with great shining eyes, and head white as snow, and a queer human look, and the crooked beak of an owl that opened with a loud grating "caw" close in his ears; and with a "bo-o-oh!" and a bounce that shook the bed and made poor Mrs. Sturk jump out of it, and spin round in the curtain, Sturk's spirit popped back again into his body which sat up wide awake that moment.

The Doctor did not choose to narrate these dreams to his brother-officers, and to be quizzed about them at mess. But he opened his budget to old Dr. Walsingham, of course, only as a matter to be smiled at by a pair of philosophers like them. But Dr. Walsingham, who was an absent man, and floated upon the ocean of his learning serenely and lazily, drawn finely and whimsically, now hither, now thither, by the finest hair of association, glided complacently off into the dim region of visionary prognostics and warnings, and reminded him how Joseph dreamed, and Pharaoh, and Benvenuto Cellini's father, and St. Dominick's mother, and Edward II. of England, not at all suspecting that he was making poor Sturk, who had looked for a cheerful, sceptical sort of essay, confoundedly dismal and uncomfortable..

And, indeed, confoundedly distressed he must have been, for he took his brother-ship, Tom Toole, whom he loved not, to counsel upon his case—of course, strictly as a question of dandelion, or gentian, or camomile flowers; and Tom, who, as we all know, loved him reciprocally, frightened him as well as he could, offered to take charge of his case, and said, looking hard at him out of the corner of his cunning, resolute, little eye, as they sauntered in the Park—

"But I need not tell you, my good sir, that physio is of small avail, if there is any sort of—a—a—vexation, or—or—in short—a—a—vexation, you know, on your mind."

"A—ha, ha, ha!—what? Murdered my father, and married my grandmother?" snarled Sturk, sneeringly, amused or affecting to be so, and striving to laugh at the daisies before his toes as he trudged along, with his hands in his breeches' pockets. "I have not a secret on earth, sir. 'Tis not a button to me, sir, who talks about me; and I don't owe a guinea, sir, that is, that I could not pay to-morrow, if I liked it; and there's nothing to trouble me—nothing, sir, except this dirty, little, gouty dyspepsy, scarce worth talking about."

Then came a considerable silence; and Toole's active little mind, having just made a note of this, tripped off smartly to half-a-dozen totally different topics, and they parted no better and no worse friends than usual, in ten minutes more, at the Toole's door-steps.

So Toole said to Mrs. T. that evening—

“Sturk owes money, mark my words, sweet heart. Remember, I say it—he'll cool his heels in a prison, if he's no wiser than of late, before a twel'month. Since the beginning of February he has lost—just wait a minute, and let me see—ay, that £150 by the levanting of old Tom Farthingale; and, I had it to-day from little O'Leary, who had it from Jim Kelly, old Craddock's conducting clerk, he's bit to the tune of three hundred more by the failure of Larkin, Brothers, and Hoolaghan. You see a little bit of usury under the rose is all very well for a vulgar dog like Sturk if he knows the town, and how to go about it; but hang it, he knows nothing. Why, the turnpike-man, over the way would not have taken old Jos. Farthingale's bill for fippence—no, nor his bond neither. Unfortunate devil—I've no reason to like him—but, truly, I do pity him.”

Saying which Tom Toole, with his back to the fire, and a look of concern thrown into his comic little mug, and his eyebrows raised, experienced a very pleasurable glow of commiseration.

Sturk, on the contrary, was more than commonly silent and savage that evening; and sat in his drawing-room, with his fists in his breeches' pockets and his heels stretched out, lurid and threatening, in a gloomy and highly electric state. Mrs. S. did not venture her usual “would my Barney like a dish of tea?” but plied her worsted and knitting-needles with mild concentration, sometimes peeping under her lashes at Sturk, and sometimes telegraphing faintly to the children if they whispered too loud.

Sturk was incensed by the suspicion that Tom Toole knew something of his losses, “the dirty, little, unscrupulous spy and tattler.” He was confident, however, that he could not know their extent. It was certainly a hard thing, and enough to exasperate a better man than Sturk, that the savings of a shrewd, and, in many ways, a self-denying life should have been swept away, and something along with them, by a few unlucky casts in little more than twelve months. And he such a clever dog, too! the best player, all to nothing, driven to the wall by a cursed obstinate run of infernal luck. And he used to scowl, and grind his teeth, and nearly break the keys and shillings in his gripe in his breeches' pocket, as imprecations, hot and unspoken, coursed one another through his brain. Then up he would get, and walk sulkily to the brandy-flask and have a dram, and feel better, and begin to count up his chances, and what he might yet save out of the fire; and resolve to press vigorously for the agency, which he thought Dangerfield, if he wanted a useful man, could not fail to give him; and he had hinted the matter to Lord Castlemallard, who, he thought, understood and favored his wishes. Yes; that agency would give him credit and opportunity, and be the foundation of his new fortunes, and the saving of him.

And so it was, somehow, when Dangerfield spoke his greeting at Sturk's ear, and the Doctor turned short round, and saw his white frizzed hair, great glass eyes, and crooked, short beak, quizzical and sinister, close by, it seemed for a second as if the "caw" and the carrion-crow of his dream was at his shoulder; and, I suppose, he showed his discomposure a little, for he smiled a good deal more than Sturk usually did at a recognition.

---

CHAPTER XXVII.

IN WHICH MR. IRONS RECOUNTS SOME OLD RECOLLECTIONS ABOUT THE PIED HORSE AND THE FLOWER DE LUCE.

It was so well known in Chapelized that Sturk was poking after Lord Castlemallard's agency that Nutter felt the scene going on before his eyes between him and Dangerfield like a public affront. His ire was that of a phlegmatic man, dangerous when stirred, and there was no mistaking, in his rigid, swarthy countenance, the state of his temper.

Dangerfield took an opportunity, and touched Nutter on the shoulder, and told him frankly, in effect, though he wished things to go on as heretofore, Sturk had wormed himself into a sort of confidence with Lord Castlemallard.

"Not confidence, sir—talk, if you please," said Nutter, grimly.

"Well, into talk," acquiesces Dangerfield; "and by Jove, I've a hard card to play, you see. His lordship will have me listen to Doctor Sturk's talk, such as it is."

"He has no talk in him, sir, you mayn't get from any other impudent dunderhead in the town," answered Nutter.

"My dear sir, understand me. I'm your friend," and he placed his hand amicably upon Nutter's arm; "but Lord Castlemallard has, now and then, a will of his own, I need not tell you; and somebody's been doing you an ill turn with his lordship; and you're a gentleman, Mr. Nutter, and I like you, and I'll be frank with you, knowing 'twill go no further. Sturk wants the agency. You have my good-will.

I don't see why he should take it from you ; but—but—you see his Lordship takes odd likings, and he won't always listen to reason."

Nutter was so shocked and exasperated, that for a moment he felt stunned, and put his hand toward his head.

"I think, sir," said Nutter, with a stern, deliberate oath, "I'll write to Lord Castlemallard this evening, and throw up his agency ; and challenge Sturk, and fight him in the morning."

"You must not resign the agency, sir ; his lordship is whimsical ; but you have a friend at court. I've spoken in full confidence on your secrecy ; and should any words pass between you and Dr. Sturk, you'll not mention my name ; I rely, sir, on your honor, as you may on my goodwill ;" and Dangerfield shook hands with Nutter significantly, and called to Irons, who was waiting to accompany him, and the two anglers walked away together up the river.

Nutter was still possessed with his furious resolution to fling down his office at Lord Castlemallard's feet, and to call Sturk into the lists of mortal combat. One turn by himself as far as the turnpike, however, and he gave up the first, and retained only the second resolve. Half-an-hour more, and he had settled in his mind, that there was no need to punish the meddler that way ; and so he resolved to bide his time—a short one.

In the meanwhile Dangerfield had reached one of those sweet pastures, by the river's bank, which, as we read, delight the simple mind of the angler, and his float was already out, and bobbing up and down on the ripples of the stream ; and the verdant valley, in which he and his taciturn companion stood side by side resounded, from time to time with Dangerfield's strange harsh laughter ; the cause of which Irons did not, of course, presume to ask.

Irons, with that never-failing phantom of a smile on his thin lips, stood a little apart, with gaff and landing-net, and a second rod, and a little bag of worms, and his other gear, silent, except when spoken to, or sometimes to suggest a change of bait, or fly, or a cast over a particular spot.

Dangerfield was looking straight at his float; but thinking of something else. Whenever Sturk met him at dinner, or the club, the Doctor's arrogance and loud lungs failed him, and he fell for a while into a sort of gloom and dreaming; and when he came slowly to himself, he could not talk to anyone but the man with the spectacles; and in the midst of his talk he would grow wandering and thoughtful, as if over some half-remembered dream; and when he took his leave of Dangerfield it was with a lingering look and a stern withdrawal, as if he had still a last word to say, and he went away in a dismal reverie. It was natural, that with his views about the agency, Sturk should regard him with particular interest. But there was something more here, and it did not escape Dangerfield, as, indeed, very little that in anywise concerned him ever did.

"Clever fellow, Doctor Sturk," said the silver spectacles looking grimly at the float. "I like him. You remember him, you say, Irons?"

"Ay, sir," says Blue-chin; "I never forget a face."

"Par nobile," sneers the angler quietly. "In the year '45, eh?—go on."

"Ay, sir; he slept in the 'Pied Horse,' at Newmarket, and was in all the fun. Next day he broke his arm badly and slept there in the closet off Mr. Beauclero's room that night under laudanum, and remained ten days longer in the house. Mr. Beauclero's chamber was the 'flower de luce.' Barnabas Sturk, Esq.—When I saw him here, half the length of the street away, I knew him and his name on the instant. I never forget things."

"But he don't remember you?"

"No," smiled Blue-chin, looking at the float also.

"Two and twenty years. How came it he was not summoned?"

"He was under laudanum, and could tell nothing."

"Ay," said the spectacles, "ay," and he let out some more line. "That's deep."

"Yes, sir; a soldier was drowned in that hole."

"And Dr. Toole and Mr. Nutter don't love him—both brisk fellows, and have fought."

Blue-olin smiled on.

"Very clever dog—needs be sharp though, or he'll come to—ha!" and a gray trout came splashing and flickering along the top of the water upon the hook, and Irons placed the net in Dangerfield's outstretched hand, and the troutling was landed, to the distant music of "God save the King," borne faintly on the air, by which the reader perceives that the band were now about to put up their instruments, and the gay folk to disperse. And at the same moment, Lord Castlemallard was doing old General Chatterworth the honor to lean upon his arm, as they walked to and fro upon the parade-ground by the river's bank, and the General looked particularly grand and thoughtful, and my lord was more than usually gracious and impressive, and was saying:

"'Tis a good match every way: he has good blood in his veins, sir, the Dangerfields of Redminster; and you may suppose he's rich, when he was ready to advance Sir Sedley Hicks thirty-five thousand pounds on mortgage, and to my certain knowledge has nearly as much more out on good securities; and he's the most principled man I think I ever met with, and the cleverest dog, I believe, in these kingdoms; and I wish you joy, General Chatterworth."

And he gave the General snuff out of his box, and shook hands, and said something very good as he got into his carriage, for he laughed a good deal, and touched the General's ribs, with the point of his gloved finger; and the General laughed too, moderately, and was instantaneously grave again, when the carriage whirled away.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

SHOWING HOW POOR MRS. MACNAMARA WAS TROUBLED AND HAUNTED TOO, AND OPENING A BUDGET OF GOSSIP.

SOME score pages back, when we were all assembled at the King's House, my reader, perhaps, may have missed our fat and cosequential, but on the whole, good-natured acquaintance, Mrs. Macnamara. She was not there, she was not well. Of late Mrs. Macnamara had lost all her pluck, and half her color, and some even of her fat. You would not have known her for the same woman.

A tall, pale female, dressed in black satin and a black velvet riding-hood, had made her two visits in a hackney-coach; but whether these had any connexion with the melancholy change referred to, I don't at this moment say. Whatever her grief was she could not bring herself to tell it. And so her damask cheek, and portly form, and rollicking animal spirits, continued to suffer.

The Major found that her mind wandered at piquet. Toole also caught her thinking of something else in the midst of his best bits of local scandal; and Magnolia several times popped in upon her large mother in tears. Once or twice Toole thought, and he was right, that she was on the point of making a disclosure. But her heart failed her, and it came to nothing. The little fellow's curiosity was on fire; and he would not believe Magnolia, who laughed at him, that she did not know all about it.

On this present morning poor Mrs. Macnamara had received a note, at which she grew pale as the large pat of butter before her, and she felt quite sick as she thrust the paper into her pocket, and tried to smile across the breakfast table at Magnolia, who was rattling away as usual, and the old Major, who was chuckling at her impudent mischief over his buttered toast and tea.

"Why, mother dear," cries Mag, suddenly "what the plague ails your pretty face? Did you ever see the like? It's for all the world like a bad batter-pudding! I lay a crown, now, that was a bill. Was it a bill? Come, now, Mullikins (a term of endearment for mother). Show us the note. It is too bad, you poor dear, old, handsome, bothered angel, you should be fretted and tormented out of your looks and your health, by them dirty shopkeepers' bills, when a five-pound note, I'm certain sure, I'd pay every mother's skin o' them, and change to spare!" And the elegant Magnolia, whose soielainet and Norwich crape petticoat were unpaid for, darted a glance of reproach full upon the Major's powdered head, the top of which was cleverly presented to receive it, as he swallowed in haste his cup of tea, and rising suddenly, for his purse had lately suffered in the service of the ladies, and wanted rest—

"'Tis nothing at all but that confounded egg," he said, raising that untasted delicacy a little towards his nose. "Why the devil will you go on buying our eggs from that dirty old sinner, Poll Delany?" And he dropped it from its cup plum into the slop-basin.

"A then maybe it was," said poor Mrs. Mac, smiling as well as she could; "but I'm better."

"No you're not, Mullikins," interposed Magnolia, impatiently. "There's Toole crossing the street, will I call him up?"

"Not for the world, Maggy darling. I'd have to pay him, and where's the money to come from?"

The Major did not hear, and was coughing besides; and recollecting that he had a word for the Adjutant's ear, took his sword off the peg where it hung, and his cocked-hat, and vanished in a twinkling.

"Pay Toole, indeed! nonsense, mother," and up went the window.

"Good-morrow to your nightcap, Doctor!"

"And the top of the morning to you, my pretty Miss chattering Mag, up on your perch there," responds the physician.

"And what in the world brings you out this way at breakfast time, and where are you going—oh! goosy, goosy, gander, where do you wander?"

"Up stairs, if you let me," says Toole, with a flourish of his hand, and a gallant grin, "and to my lady's chamber."

"And did you hear the news?" demands Miss Mag.

The Doctor glanced over his shoulder, and seeing the coast clear, he was by this time close under the little scarlet geranium pots that stood on the window-sill.

"Miss Chatterworth, eh?" he asked, in a sly, low tone.

"Oh, bother her, no. Do you remember Miss Anne Majoribanks, that lodged in Doyle's house, down there, near the mills, last summer, with her mother, the fat woman with the poodle, and the—don't you know?"

"Ay, ay; she wore a flowered silk tabby sacque, on band days," said Toole, who had an eye and a corner in his memory for female costume, "a fine showy—I remember."

"Well, middling: that's she."

"And what of her?" asked Toole, screwing himself up as close as he could to the flower-pots.

"Come up and I'll tell you," and she shut down the window, and beckoned him slyly, and up came Toole all alive.

Miss Magnolia told her story in her usual animated way, sometimes dropping her voice to a whisper, and taking Toole by the collar, sometimes rising to a rollicking roar of laughter, while the little Doctor stood by, his hands in his breeches' pockets, making a pleasant jingle with his loose butter before him, and his long eyes, and a sort of paper into his hand, and his ugly face. Then came fast table:—

the old man, long may-pole, Gerry Chat-over, and that any one cares tuppence if

"Well, ha, ha! sweep the cobwebs off the moon, please, and know, you know," said Miss Mag, It computer! they say—but d'ye mind, I don't don't believe it—but they do say she's got married to—who do you think now?" answered

Old Colonel Bligh, of the Magazine, or Dr. Walsingham, may be," cries Mag, with a burst of laughter; "no young fellow would be plagued with her, I'm certain."

"Well, ha, ha! you are a conjuror, Miss Mag, to be sure. He's not young—you're right there—but then, he's rich, he is, by Jove! there's no end of his—well, what do you say to Mr. Dangerfield?"

"Dangerfield! Well," (after a little pause) he's ugly enough and old enough too, for the matter of that; but he's as rich as a pork-pie; and if he's worth half what they say, you may take my word for it when he goes to church it won't be to marry the steeple."

And she laughed again scornfully and added—

"'Twas plain enough from the first, the whole family laid themselves out to catch the old quiz and his money. Let the Chattosworths alone for scheming, with all their grand airs. Much I mind them! Why, the old sinner was not an hour in the town when he was asked over the way to Belmont, and Miss dressed out there like a puppet, to simper and flatter the rich old land agent, and butter him up—my Lord Castlemallard's bailiff—if you please, ha, ha, ha! and the Duchess of Belmont, that ballyrags every one round her, like a tipsy old soldier, as civil as six, my dear sir, and all to marry that long, sly huzzy to a creature old enough to be her grandfather, though she's no chicken neither. Faugh! filthy!" and Miss Magnolia went through an elegant pantomime of spitting over her shoulder into the grate.

Toole thought there was but one old fellow of his acquaintance who might be creditably married by a girl young enough to be his granddaughter, and that was honest Arthur Slowe; and he was going to insinuate a joke of the sort; but perceiving that his sly preparatory glance was not pleasantly responded to, he went off to another topic.

The fact is, that Toole knew something of Miss Mag's plans, as he did of most of the neighbors' beside. Old Slowe was, in certain preponderating respects, much to be preferred to the Stalworth Fireworker, Mr. Lieutenant O'Flaherty. And the two gentlemen were upon her list. Two strings to a bow is a time-honored provision. Cupid often goes so furnished. If the first snap at the critical moment, should we bow-string our precious throttles with the pieces? Far be it from us! The lover, the hero of the piece, upon whose requited passion and splendid settlements the curtain goes down, is a role not always safely to be confided to the genius and discretion of a single performer. Will not the prudent manager provide a substitute respectably to fill the part, in the sad event of one of those sudden indispositions to which she here is but too liable? Following this precedent, then, that wise virgin, Miss Magnolia, and her sagacious mamma, had allotted the role in question to Arthur Slowe, who was the better furnished for the part, and on the whole, the stronger "cast." But, failing him, Lieutenant O'Flaherty was quietly, but unconsciously, as the phrase is, "under-studying" that somewhat uncertain gentleman.

"And the General's off to Scarborough," said Toole.

"Old Chatterworth! I thought it was to Bath."

"Oh, no, Scarborough; a touch of the old rheum, and change there, with open mouth and staring eyes, and a sort of breathless grin all over his ruddy face. Then came another story, and more chuckling.

"And what about that lanky long may-pole, Gerty Chatterworth, the witch?—not that any one cares tuppence if she rode on a broom to sweep the cobwebs off the moon, only a body may as well know, you know," said Miss Mag, preparing to listen.

"Why, by Jupiter! they say—but d'ye mind, I don't know, and faith I don't believe it—but they do say she's going to be married to—who do you think now?" answered Toole.

"Old Colonel Bligh, of the Magazine, or Dr. Walsingham, may be," cries Mag, with a burst of laughter; "no young fellow would be plagued with her, I'm certain."

"Well, ha, ha! you are a conjuror, Miss Mag, to be sure. He's not young—you're right there—but then, he's rich, he is, by Jove! there's no end of his—well, what do you say to Mr. Dangerfield?"

"Dangerfield! Well," (after a little pause) he's ugly enough and old enough too, for the matter of that; but he's as rich as a pork-pie; and if he's worth half what they say, you may take my word for it when he goes to church it won't be to marry the steeple."

And she laughed again scornfully and added—

"'Twas plain enough from the first, the whole family laid themselves out to catch the old quiz and his money. Let the Chatterworths alone for scheming, with all their grand airs. Much I mind them! Why, the old sinner was not an hour in the town when he was asked over the way to Belmont, and Miss dressed out there like a puppet, to simper and flatter the rich old land agent, and butter him up—my Lord Castlemallard's bailiff—if you please, ha, ha, ha! and the Duchess of Belmont, that ballyrags every one round her, like a tipsy old soldier, as civil as six, my dear sir, and all to marry that long, sly huzzy to a creature old enough to be her grandfather, though she's no chicken neither. Faugh ! filthy !" and Miss Magnolia went through an elegant pantomime of spitting over her shoulder into the grate.

Toole thought there was but one old fellow of his acquaintance who might be creditably married by a girl young enough to be his granddaughter, and that was honest Arthur Slowe ; and he was going to insinuate a joke of the sort ; but perceiving that his sly preparatory glance was not pleasantly responded to, he went off to another topic.

The fact is, that Toole knew something of Miss Mag's plans, as he did of most of the neighbors' beside. Old Slowe was, in certain preponderating respects, much to be preferred to the Stalworth Fireworker, Mr. Lieutenant O'Flaherty. And the two gentlemen were upon her list. Two strings to a bow is a time-honored provision. Cupid often goes so furnished. If the first snap at the critical moment, should we bow-string our precious throttles with the pieces ? Far be it from us ! The lover, the hero of the piece, upon whose requited passion and splendid settlements the curtain goes down, is a role not always safely to be confided to the genius and discretion of a single performer. Will not the prudent manager provide a substitute respectably to fill the part, in the sad event of one of those sudden indispositions to which she here is but too liable ? Following this precedent, then, that wise virgin, Miss Magnolia, and her sagacious mamma, had allotted the role in question to Arthur Slowe, who was the better furnished for the part, and on the whole, the stronger "cast." But, failing him, Lieutenant O'Flaherty was quietly, but unconsciously, as the phrase is, "under-studying" that somewhat uncertain gentleman.

"And the General's off to Scarborough," said Toole.

"Old Chatterworth ! I thought it was to Bath."

"Oh, no, Scarborough ; a touch of the old rheum, and wind in the stomach. He's away in the Hillsborough packet for Holyhead this morning, and Colonel Stafford's left in command."

"And my Lady Becky Belmont's superseded," laughed Miss Magnolia, derisively.

"And who do you think's going to make the grand tour? from Paris to Naples, if you please, and from Naples to Rome, and up to Venice, and home through Germany, and deuce knows where beside; you'll not guess in a twel'-month," said Toole, watching her with a chuckle.

"Devereux, maybe," guessed the young lady.

"No tish't," said Toole delighted; "try again!"

"Well, 'tis, let me see. Some wild young rogue, with a plenty of money, I warrant, if I could only think of him—come, don't keep me all day—who the plague is he, Toole?" urged the young lady, testily.

"Dan Loftus," answered Toole, ha, ha, ha, ha!"

"Dan Loftus!—the grand tour—why, where's the world running to? Oh, ho, ho, ho, hoo! what a macaroni!" and they laughed heartily over it, and called him "travelled monkey," and I know not what else.

"Why, I thought Dr. Walsingham designed him for his ourate; but what in the wide world brings Dan Loftus to foreign parts—'To dance and sing for the Spanish King, and to sing and dance for the Queen of France?'"

"Hey! Dan's got a good place, I can tell you—travelling tutor to the hopeful young lord that is to be—Devereux's cousin. By all the Graces, ma'am, 'tis the blind leading the blind. I don't know which of the two is craziest; but Dan's a good creature, and we'll—we'll miss him. I like Dan, and he loves the Rector—I like him for that; where there's gratitude and fidelity, Miss Mag, there's no lack of other virtues, I warrant you—and the good Doctor has been a wonderful loving friend to poor Dan, and God bless him for it, say I, and amen."

"And amen with all my heart," said Miss Mag, gaily; "'tis an innocent creature—poor Dan; though he'd be none the worse of a little more lace to his hat, and a little less Latin in his head. But see here, Doctor, here's my poor old goose of a mother (and she kissed her cheek), as sick as a cat in a tub."

And she whispered something in Toole's wig, and they both laughed uproariously.

"I would not take five guineas and tell you what she says," cried Toole.

"Don't mind the old blackguard, mother dear!" screamed Magnolia, dealing Æsculapius a lusty slap on the back; and the cook at that moment knocking at the door, called off the young lady to the larder, who cried over her shoulder as she lingered a moment at the door—"Now, send her something, Toole, for my sake, to do her poor heart good. Do you mind—for faith and troth the dear old soul is sick and sad; and I won't let that brute, Sturk, though he does wear our uniform, next or near her."

"Well, 't isn't for me to say, eh?"—and now she's gone, —just let me try." And he took her pulse.

---

CHAPTER XXIX.

CONCERNING A CERTAIN WOMAN IN BLACK.

AND Toole, holding her stout wrist, felt her pulse and said—"Hem—I see—and"—

And so he ran on with half-a-dozen questions, and at the end of his catechism said, bluntly enough—

"I tell you what it is, Mrs. Mack, you have something on your mind, my dear madam, and till it's off, you'll never be better."

Poor Mrs. Mack opened her eyes, and made a gesture of amazed disclaimer with her hands palm upwards. It was all affectation.

"Pish!" said Toole, who saw the secret almost in his grasp; "don't tell me, my dear madam—don't you think I know my business by this time o' day. I tell you again you'd better ease your mind—or take my word for it you'll be sorry too late. How would you like to go off like poor old Peggy Slowe—eh? There's more paralysis, apoplexy, heart-diseases, and lunacy, caused in one year by that sort of silly secrecy and moping, than by—hang it! My dear madam," urged Toole, breaking into a bold exhortation on seeing signs of confusion and yielding in his fat patient—"you'd tell me all that concerns your health, and know that Tom Toole would put his hand in the fire before he'd let a living soul hear a symptom of your case; and here's some paltry little folly or trouble that I would not—as I'm a gentleman—give a half-penny to hear, and you're afraid to tell me—though until you do, neither I, nor all the doctors in Europe, can do you a ha'porth o' good."

"Oh; Dr. Toole, I am in trouble—and I'd like to tell you; but won't you—won't you promise me now, on your solemn honor, if I do, you won't tell a human being," blubbered the poor matron.

"Conscience, honor, veracity, ma'am—but why should I say any more—don't you know me, my dear Mrs. Mack?" said Toole in a hot fidget, and with all the persuasion of which he was master.

"Indeed, I do—and I'm in great trouble—and sometimes think no one can take me out of it," pursued she.

"Come, come, my dear madam, is it money?" demanded Toole.

"Oh! no—it's—'tis a dreadful—that is, there is money in it—but oh! dear Doctor Toole, there's a frightful woman, and I don't know what to do; and I sometimes thought you might be able to help me—you're so clever—and I was going to tell you, but I was ashamed—there now, it's out," and she blubbered aloud.

"What's out?" said Toole, irritated. "I can't stop here all day, you know; and if you'd rather I'd go, say so."

"Oh no, but the Major, nor Maggy does not know a word about it; and so, for your life, don't tell them; and—and—here it is."

And from her pocket she produced a number of the Freeman's Journal, five or six weeks old, and a great deal soiled.

"Read it, read it, Doctor dear, and you'll see."

"Read all this! thank you, ma'am; I read it a month ago," said the Doctor gruffly.

"Oh! no—this—only there—you see—here," and she indicated a particular advertisement, which we here reprint for the reader's instruction; and thus it ran—

"MARY MATCHWELL'S most humble Respects attend the Nobility and Gentry. She has the Honor to acquaint them that she transacts all Business relative to Courtship and Marriage, with the utmost Dispatch and Punctuality. She has, at considerable Expense, procured a complete List of all the unmarried Persons of both Sexes in this Kingdom, with an exact Account of their Characters, Fortunes, Ages, and Persons. Any Lady or Gentleman, by sending a Description of the Husband or Wife they would chuse, shall be informed where such a One is to be had, and put in a Method for obtaining him, or her, in the speediest Manner, and at the smallest Expense. Mrs. Matchwell's Charges being always proportioned to the Fortunes of the Parties, and not to be paid till the Marriage takes Place. She hopes the Honor and Secrecy she will observe in her Dealings, will encourage an unfortunate Woman, who hath experienced the greatest Vicissitudes of Life, as will be seen in her Memoirs, which are shortly to be published under the Title of 'Fortune's Football.' All Letters directed to M. M., and sent Post paid to the Office where this Paper is published, shall be answered with Care."

"Yes, yes, I remember that—a cheating gipsy—why, it's going on still—I saw it again yesterday, I think—a lying jade !—and this is the rogue that troubles you ?” said Toole with his finger on the paragraph, as the paper lay on the table.

“ Give it to me, Doctor, dear. I would not have them see it for the world—and—and—oh ! Doctor—sure you wouldn’t tell ?”

“ Augh, bother—didn’t I swear my soul, ma’am ; and do you think I’m going to commit a perjury about ‘ Mary Matchwell’—phiat !”

Well, with much ado, and a great circumbendibus, and floods of tears, and all sorts of deprecations and confusions, out came the murder at last.

Poor Mrs. Mack had a duty to perform by her daughter. Her brother was the best man in the world ; but what with ‘ them shockin’ forfeitures’ in her father’s time, (a Jacobite grand-uncle had forfeited a couple of town-lands, value £37 per annum, in King William’s time, and to that event, in general terms, she loved to refer the ruin of her family), and some youthful extravagances, his income, joined to her’s, could not keep the dear child in that fashion and appearance her mother had enjoyed before her, and people without pedigree or solid pretension of any sort, looked down upon her, just because they had money, and denied her the position which was hers of right, and so seeing no other way of doing the poor child justice, she applied to “ M. M ”

“ To find a husband for Mag, eh ?” said Toole.

“ No, no. Oh, Dr. Toole, ‘twas—’twas for me,” sobbed poor Mrs. Mack. Toole stared for a moment, and had to turn quickly about, and admire some shell-work in a glass box over the chimney-piece very closely, and I think his stout short back was shaking tremulously as he did so ; and, when he turned round again, though his face was extraordinarily grave, it was a good deal redder than usual.

"Well, my dear madam, and where's the great harm in that, when all's done?" said Toole.

"Oh, Doctor, I had the unpardonable wakeness, whatever come over me, to write her two letters on the subject, and she'll print them, and expose me, unless,"—here she rolled herself about in an agony of tears, and buried her fat face in the back of the chair.

"Unless you give her money, I suppose," said Toole. "There's what invariably comes of confidential communications with female enchanters and gipsies! And what do you propose to do?"

"I don't know—what can I do? She got the £5 I borrowed from my brother, and he can't lend me more; and I can't tell him what I done with that; and she has £3 10s. I—I raised on my best fan, and the elegant soi-lainet, you know;" and his poor patient turned up her eyes imploringly to his face, and her good-natured old features were quivering all over with tribulation.

"And Mag knows nothing of all this?" said Toole.

"Oh, not for the wide world," whispered the matron, in great alarm. "Whisht! is that her coming?"

"No; there she is across the street talking to Mrs. Nutter. Listen to me: I'll manage that lady, Mrs. Mary—what's her name?—Matchwell. I take her in hands, and—whisper now."

So Toole entered into details, and completed an officious little conspiracy; and the upshot of it was that Mrs. Maek, whenever M. M. fixed a day for her next extortionate visit, was to apprise the Doctor, who was to keep in the way; and, when she arrived, the good lady was just to send across to him for some "peppermint drops," upon which hint Toole himself would come slyly over, and place himself behind the arras in the bedroom, whither, for greater seclusion and secrecy, she was to conduct the redoubted Mary Matchwell, who was thus to be overheard, and taken by the clever Doctor flagrante delicto; and then and there frightened not only into a surrender of the documents, but of the money she had already extracted, and compelled to sign such a confession of her guilt as would effectually turn the tables, and place her at the mercy of the once more happy Macnamara.

The Doctor was so confident, and the scheme, to the sanguine Celtic imagination of the worthy matron, appeared so facile of execution and infallible of success, that I believe she would at that moment have embraced, and even kissed, little Toole, in the exuberance of her gratitude, had that learned physician cared for such fooleries. He shook her cordially by the hand, at his departure, patting her encouragingly at the same time, on her fat shoulders, and with a sly grim and a wink, and a wag of his head—offering to “lay fifty,” that between them “they’d be too hard for the witch.”

---

CHAPTER XXX.

BEING A SHORT HISTORY OF THE GREAT BATTLE OF BELMONT, THAT LASTED FOR SO MANY DAYS, WHEREIN THE BELLIGERENTS SHOWED SO MUCH CONSTANCY AND VALOR, AND SOMETIMES ONE SIDE AND SOMETIMES T’OTHER WAS VICTORIOUS.

So jolly old General Chatterworth was away to Scarborough, and matters went by no means pleasantly at Belmont; for there was strife between the ladies. Dangerfield—cunning fellow—went first to Aunt Becky with his proposal; and Aunt Becky liked it—determined it should prosper, and took up and conducted the case with all her intimidating energy and ferocity. But Gertrude's character had begun to show itself of late in new and marvellous lights, and she fought her aunt with cool, but invincible courage; and why should she marry, and above all, why marry that horrid, grim old gentleman, Mr. Dangerfield. No, she had money enough of her own to walk through life in maiden meditation, fancy free, without being beholden to anybody for a sixpence. Why, Aunt Rebecca herself had never married, and was she not all the happier of her freedom? Aunt Rebecca tried before the General went away, to inflame and stir him up upon the subject. But he had no capacity for coercion. She almost regretted she had made him so very docile. He would leave the matter altogether to his daughter. So Aunt Rebecca, as usual, took, as we have said, the carriage of the proceedings.

Since the grand eclairoissement had taken place between Mervyn and Gertrude Chatterworth, they met with as slight and formal recognition as was possible, consistently with courtesy. Puddock had now little to trouble him upon a topic which had once cost him some uneasiness, and Mervyn acquiesced serenely in the existing state of things, and seemed disposed to be "sweet upon" pretty Lillias Walsingham, if that young lady had allowed it; but her father had dropped hints about his history and belongings which surrounded him in her eyes with a sort of chill and supernatural halo. Something of the same unpleasant influence, too, or was it fancy, she thought his approach seemed now to exercise upon Gertrude also, and that she, too, was unaccountably chilled and darkened by his handsome, but ill-omened presence.

Aunt Becky was not a woman to be soon tired, or ever daunted. The young lady's resistance put her upon her mettle, and she was all the more determined, that she suspected her niece had some secret motive for rejecting a partner in some respects so desirable.

Sometimes, it is true, Gertrude's resistance flagged; but this was only the temporary acquiescence of fatigue, and the battle was renewed with the old spirit on the next occasion, and was all to be fought over again. At breakfast there was generally, as I may say, an affair of picquets, and through the day a dropping fire, sometimes rising to a skirmish; but the social meal of supper was generally the period when, for the most part, these desultory hostilities blazed up into a general action. The fortune of war as usual shifted. Sometimes Gertrude left the parlor, and effected a retreat to her bed-room. Sometimes it was Aunt Rebecca's turn to slam the door, and leave the field to her adversary. Sometimes, indeed, Aunt Becky thought she had actually finished the exhausting campaign, when her artillery flamed and thundered over the prostrate enemy for a full half hour unanswered; but when, at the close of the cannonade, she marched up, to occupy the position and fortify her victory, she found, much to her mortification, that the foe had only, as it were, lain down to let her shrapnels and canister fly over, and the advance was arrested with the old volley and hurrah. And there they were—not an inch gained—peppering away at one another as briskly as ever, with the work to begin all over again.

"You think I have neither eyes nor understanding; but I can see, young lady, as well as another; ay, madam, I've eyes, and some experience too, and 'tis my simple duty to my brother, and to the name I bear, to prevent, if my influence or authority can do it, the commission of a folly which, I can't but suspect, may possibly be meditated, and which, even you, niece, would live very quickly to repent."

Gertrude did not answer; she only looked a little doubtfully at her aunt, with a gaze of deep, uneasy inquiry. That sort of insinuation seemed to disconcert her. But she did not challenge her aunt to define her meaning; and the attack was soon renewed at another point.

When Gertrude walked down to the town, to the King's House, or even to see Lily, at this side of the bridge, Dominick, the footman, was ordered to trudge after her—a sort of state she had never used in her little neighborly rambles—and Gertrude knew that her aunt catechised that confidential retainer daily. Under this sort of management, the haughty girl winced and fretted, and finally sulked, grew taciturn and sarcastic, and shut herself up altogether within the precincts of Belmont.

---

CHAPTER XXXI.

NARRATING HOW, LIEUTENANT PUDDOCK AND CAPTAIN
DEVEREUX BREWED A BOWL OF PUNCH, AND HOW THEY SANG AND DISCOURSED TOGETHER.

Among other persons unexpectedly disturbed just now was our friend Captain Devereux. Little Puddock walked to his lodgings with him from the club, where he had just given a thplendid rethitation from Shakspeare, and was, as usual after such efforts, in a high state of excitement, and lectured his companion, for whom, by-the-by, he cherished a boyish admiration, heightened very considerably by his not quite understanding him, upon the extraordinary dramatic capabilities and versatilities of Shakspeare's plays, which, he said, were not half comprehended.

"It wath only on Tuethday—the night, you know, I fired the pithtol at the robbers, near the dog-house, through the coach-window, returning all alone from Smock-alley Theatro. I was thinking, upon my honor, if I had your parts, my dear Devereux, and could write as I know you can, I'd make a variation upon every play of Shaktpeare, that should be strictly moulded upon it, and yet in no respect recognisable."

"Ay, like those Irish airs that will produce tears or laughter, as they are played slow or quick; or minced veal, my dear Puddock, which the cook can dress either savory or sweet at pleasure; or Aunt Rebecca, that produces such different emotions in her different moods, and according to our different ways of handling her, is scarce recognisable in some of them, though still the same Aunt Becky," answered Devereux, knocking at Irons' door.

"No, but seriously, by sometimeth changing an old perthion to a young, sometimeth a comical to a melancholy, or the reverthe, sometimeth a male for a female, or a female for a male—I assure you, you can so entirely dithguithe the piece, and yet produthe situationth so new and thurprithing—"

"I see, by all the gods at once, 'tis an immortal idea! Let's take Othello—I'll set about it to-morrow—to night, by Jove! A gay young Venetian nobleman, of singular beauty charmed by her tales of 'anthropophagites and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders,' is seduced from his father's house, and married by a middle-aged, somewhat hard featured black woman, Juno, or Dido, who takes him away—not to Cyprus—we must be original, but we'll suppose, to the island of Stromboli—and you can have an eruption firing away during the last act. There Dido grows jealous of our hero, though he's as innocent as Joseph; and while his valet is putting him to bed he'll talk to him and prattle some plaintive little tale how his father had a man called Barbarus. And then all being prepared, and his bed-room candle put out, Dido enters, looking unusually grim, and smothers him with a pillow in spite of his cries and affecting entreaties, and — By Jupiter! here's a letter from Bath, too."

He had lighted the candles, and the letter with its great red eye of a zeal, lying upon the table, transfixed his wandering glance, and smote somehow to his heart with an indefinite suspense and misgiving.

"With your permission, my dear Puddock?" said Devereux, before breaking the seal; for in those days they grew ceremonious the moment a point of etiquette turned up. Puddock gave him leave, and he read the letter.

"From my aunt," he said, throwing it down again with a discontented air; and then he read it once more, and thought for a while, and put it into his pocket. "The countess says I must go, Puddock. She has got my leave from the General; and hang it—there's no help for it—I can't vex her, you know. Indeed, Puddock I would not vex her. Poor old aunt—she has been mighty kind to me—no one knows how kind. So I leave to-morrow."

"Not to stay away!" exclaimed Puddock, much concerned.

"I don't know, dear Puddock. I know no more than the man in the moon what her plans are. Lewis, you know, is ordered by the doctors to Malaga; and Loftus—honest dog—I managed that little trifle for him—goes with him; and the poor old lady, I suppose, is in the vapors, and wants me—and that's all. And, Puddock, we must drink a bowl of punch together—you and I—or something—anything—what you please."

And so they sat some time longer, and grew very merry and friendly, and a little bit pathetic in their several ways. And Puddock divulged his secret but noble flame for Gertrude Chattesworth, and Devereux sang a song or two, defying fortune, in his sweet, sad tenor; and the nymph who who skipt up and down stairs with the kettle grew sleepy at last; and Mrs. Irons rebelled in her bed, and refused peremptorily to get up again, to furnish the musical toppers with rum and lemons, and Puddock, having studied his watch—with a slight hiccough and supernatural solemnity for about five minutes, satisfied himself it was nearly one o'clock, and took an affecting, though soldierlike leave of his comrade, who, however, lent him his arm down stairs, which were rather steep; and having with difficulty dissuaded him from walking into the clock, the door of which was ajar, thought it his duty to see the gallant little Lieutenant home to his lodgings, and so in the morning good little Puddock's head ached. He had gone to bed with his waistcoat and leggings on—and his watch was missing and despaired of till discovered, together with a lemon, in the pocket of his surtout, hanging against the wall; and a variety of other strange arrangements were discoverable, with not one of which could Puddock connect himself.

---

CHAPTER XXXII.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN DEVEREUX'S FIDDLE PLAYS A PRELUDE TO "OVER THE HILLS AND FAR AWAY."

THERE was some little undefinable coolness between old General Chatterworth and Devereux. He admired the young fellow, and he liked good blood in his corps, but somehow he was glad when he thought he was likely to go. When old Bligh, of the Magazine, commended the handsome young dog's good looks, the General would grow grave all at once, and sniff once or twice, and say, "Yes, a good-looking fellow certainly, and might make a good officer, a mighty good officer, but he's wild, a troublesome dog." And, lowering his voice, "I tell you what, Colonel, as long as a young buck sticks to his claret, it is all fair; but hang it, you see I'm afraid he likes other things, and he won't wait till after dinner—this between ourselves, you know. 'Tis not a button to me, by Jupiter, what he does or drinks, off duty ; but hang it, I'm afraid some day he'll break out ; and once or twice, in a friendly way, you know, I've had to speak with him, and, to say truth, I'd rather he served under any one else. He's a fine young fellow, 'tis a pity there should be anything wrong, and it would half break my heart to have to take a public course with him ; not, you know, that it has ever come to any thing like that—but—but I've heard things—and—and he must pull up, or he'll not do for the service." So, though the thing did not amount to a scandal, there was a formality between Devereux and his commanding officer who thought he saw bad habits growing apace, and apprehended that ere long disagreeable relations might arise between them.

Lord Athenry had been no friend to Devereux in his nonage, and his good-natured countess, to make amends, had always done her utmost to spoil him, and given him a great deal more of his own way, as well as of plum-cake, and Jamaica preserves, and afterwards a great deal more money, than was altogether good for him. Like many a worse person, she was a little bit capricious, and a good deal selfish ; but the young fellow was handsome. She was proud of his singularly good looks, and his wickedness interested her, and she gave him more money than to all the best public charities to which she contributed put together. Devereux, indeed, being a fast man, with such acres as he inherited, which certainly did not reach a thousand, mortgaged pretty smartly, and with as much personal debt beside, of the fashionable and refined sort, as became a young buck of bright though doubtful expectations—and if the truth must be owned, sometimes pretty nearly pushed into a corner—was beholden, not only for his fun, but occasionally for his daily bread and even his liberty, to those benevolent doles.

He did not like her peremptory summons ; but he could not afford to quarrel with his bread and butter, nor to kill by undutiful behavior the fair, plump bird, whose golden eggs were so very convenient. I don't know whether there may not have been some slight signs in the hand-writing—in a phrase, perhaps, or in the structure of the composition, which a clever analysis might have detected, and which only reached him vaguely, with a foreboding that he was not to see Chapelizod again so soon as usual when this trip was made. And, in truth, his aunt had plans. She designed his retirement from the Royal Irish Artillery, and had negotiated an immediate berth for him on the staff of the Commander of the Forces, and a prospective one in the household of Lord Townshend; she had another arrangement “on the anvil” for a seat in Parliament, which she would accomplish, if that were possible; and finally, a wife. In fact her ladyship had encountered old General Chatterworth at Scarborough only the autumn before, and they had had, in that gay resort, a good deal of serious talk, between their cards and other recreations, the result of which was, that she began to think, with the good General, that Devereux would be better where one unlucky misadventure would not sully his reputation for life. Besides, she thought Chapelizod was not safe ground for a young fellow so eccentric, perverse, and impetuous, where pretty faces were plentier than good fortunes, and at every tinkling harpsichord there smiled a possible mesalliance. In the town of Chapelizod itself, indeed, the young gentleman did not stand quite so high in estimation as with his aunt, who thought nothing was good or high enough for her handsome nephew, with his good blood and his fine possibilities. The village folk, however, knew that he was confoundedly dipped; that he was sometimes alarmingly pestered by duns, and had got so accustomed to hear that his uncle, the Earl, was in his last sickness, and his cousin, the next heir, dead, when another week disclosed that neither one nor the other was a bit worse than usual, that they began to think that Devereux's turn might very possibly never come at all. Besides, the townspeople had high notions of some of their belles, and not without reason. There was Miss Gertrude Chatterworth, for instance, with more than fourteen thousand pounds to her fortune, and Lillias Walsingham, who would inherit her mother's money, and the good rector's estate of twelve hundred a-year beside, and both with good blood in their veins, and beautiful princesses too. However, in those days there was more parental despotism than now. The old people kept their worldly wisdom to themselves, and did not take the young into a scheming partnership; and youth and beauty, I think, were more romantic, and a great deal less venal.

Such being the old countess's programme—a plan, according to her lights, grand and generous, she might have dawdled over it, for a good while, for she did not love trouble. It was now new; the airy castle had been some years built, and now, in an unwonted hurry, she wished to introduce the tenant to the well-aired edifice, and put him in actual possession. For a queer little attack in her head, which she called a fainting fit, and to which nobody dared afterwards to make allusion, and which she had bullied herself and everybody about her into forgetting, had, nevertheless, frightened her confoundedly. And when her helpless panic and hysterics were over, she silently resolved, if the thing were done, then 'twere well 'twere done quickly

---

Miss Wardle's letter in her hand, full, of course, of shocking anecdotes about lunatics, and the sufferings of Fleet prisoners, and all the statistics, and inquiries, and dry little commissions, with which that worthy lady's correspondence abounded. It was open in her hand, and rustled sharp and stiffly in the air, but it was not inviting just then. From that point it was always a pretty look down or up the river; and her eyes followed with the flow of its waters towards Inchicore. And just at that moment she heard a sweet tenor, with a gaiety somehow pathetic, sing not far away the words she remembered—

"And she smiled upon the stream,
Like one that smiles at folly,
A dreamer on a dream,"

Devereux was coming—it was his playful salutation. Her large eyes dropped to the ground with the matchless blush of youth. She was strangely glad, but vexed at having changed color; but when he came up with her, in the deep shadow thrown by the old pier, with its thick festooneries, he could not tell, he only knew she looked beautiful.

"My dreams take wing, but my follies will not leave me. And you have been ill, Miss Lilies?"

"Oh, nothing; only a little cold."

"And I am going—I only knew last night—really going away." He paused; but the young lady did not feel called upon to say anything, and only allowed him to go on. "And I've a great mind, now that I'm departing this little world;" and he glanced, it seemed to her, regretfully towards the village; "to put you down, Miss Lily, if you will allow it, in my codicil for a legacy"—

She laughed a pleasant little careless laugh.

"Then, I suppose, if you were not to see me for some

"About half an hour ago," Mrs. Sturk thought: and so, with a word or two more, and a kissing of hands, the good lady turned, with her brood, up the Park lane, and Lily walked on to pay her visit to Mrs. Colonel Stafford, feeling all the way a strange pang of anger and disappointment.

"To think of his going away without taking leave of my father!"

And when she reached the hall-door of the King's House, for a moment she forgot what she had come for, and was relieved to find that good Mrs. Stafford was in town.

There was then, I don't know whether there is not now, a little path leading by the river bank from Chapelized to Island-bridge, just an angler's foot-path, devious and broken, but withal very sweet and pretty. Leaving the King's House, she took this way home, and as she walked down to the river bank, the mortified girl looked down upon the grass close by her feet, and whispered to the daisies as she went along—"No, there's no more kindness nor friendliness left in the world; the people are all cold creatures now, and hypocrites; and I'm glad he's gone."

She paused at the stile which went over the hedge just beside an old fluted pier, with a grass-grown urn at top, and overgrown with a climbing rose-tree, just such a study as a young lady might put in her album; and then she recollected the long letter from old Miss Wardle that Aunt Becky had sent her to read, with a request, which from that quarter was a command, that she should return it by six o'clock, for Aunt Becky, even in matters indifferent, liked to name hours, and nail people sharp and hard to futile appointments and barren punctualities.

She paused at the stile; she liked the old pier; its partner next the river was in fragments, and the ruin and the survivor had both been clothed by good Mrs. Stafford—who drew a little, and cultivated the picturesque—with the roses I have mentioned, besides woodbine and ivy. She had old

Miss Wardle's letter in her hand, full, of course, of shocking anecdotes about lunatics, and the sufferings of Fleet prisoners, and all the statistics, and inquiries, and dry little commissions, with which that worthy lady's correspondence abounded. It was open in her hand, and rustled sharp and stiffly in the air, but it was not inviting just then. From that point it was always a pretty look down or up the river; and her eyes followed with the flow of its waters towards Inchicore. And just at that moment she heard a sweet tenor, with a gaiety somehow pathetic, sing not far away the words she remembered—

"And she smiled upon the stream,
Like one that smiles at folly,
A dreamer on a dream,"

Devereux was coming—it was his playful salutation. Her large eyes dropped to the ground with the matchless blush of youth. She was strangely glad, but vexed at having changed color; but when he came up with her, in the deep shadow thrown by the old pier, with its thick festooneries, he could not tell, he only knew she looked beautiful.

"My dreams take wing, but my follies will not leave me. And you have been ill, Miss Lillias?"

"Oh, nothing; only a little cold."

"And I am going—I only knew last night—really going away." He paused; but the young lady did not feel called upon to say anything, and only allowed him to go on. "And I've a great mind, now that I'm departing this little world;" and he glanced, it seemed to her, regretfully towards the village; "to put you down, Miss Lily, if you will allow it, in my codicil for a legacy"—

She laughed a pleasant little careless laugh.

"Then, I suppose, if you were not to see me for some time, or maybe for ever, the village folks won't break their hearts after Dick Devereux."

And the Gipsy Captain smiled, and his eyes threw a soft violet shadow down upon her; and there was that in his tone which for a moment touched her with a strange reproach, like a bar of sweet music.

"Break our hearts? Not all, perhaps; but of course I—the parson's daughter—I should, and old Moore, the barber, and Pat Moran, the hackney coachman, and Mrs. Irons, your fat landlady, you've been so very good to all of us, you know."

"Well," he interrupted, "I've left my white surtout to Moran; a hat, let me see, and a pair of buckles to Moore; and my glass and china, to dear Mrs. Irons."

"Hat—buckles—surtout—glass—china—gone! Then it seems to me your earthly possessions are pretty nearly disposed of, and your worldly cares at an end."

"Yes; very nearly, but not quite," he laughed. "I have one treasure left—my poor monkey; he's a wonderful fellow—he has travelled half over the world, and is a perfect fine gentleman—and my true comrade until now. Do you think Dr. Walsingham, of his charity, would give the poor fellow free quarters at the Elms?"

She was going to make answer with a jest, satirically; but her mood changed quickly. It was, she thought, saucy of Captain Devereux to fancy that she should care to have his pet; and she answered a little gravely—

"I can't say, indeed; had you cared to see him, you might have asked him; but indeed, Captain Devereux, I believe you're jesting."

"Faith! madam, I believe I am; or, it does not much matter—dreaming perhaps. I said I had but one treasure left," he continued, with a fierce sort of tenderness that was peculiar to him: "and I did not mean to tell you, but I will. Look at that Miss Lily, 'tis the little rose you left on your harpsichord this morning. I stole it: 'tis mine; and Richard Devereux would die rather than lose it to another."

So then, after all, he had been at the Elms; and she had wronged him.

"You are, then, really going?" she said, so that no one would have guessed how strangely she felt at that moment.

"Yes, really going," he said, quite in his own way; "Over the hills and far away; and so, I know, you'll first wish your old friend, God speed."

"I do, indeed."

"And then you'll shake hands, Miss Lily, as in old times."

And out came the frank little hand, and he looked on it, with a darkling smile, as it lay in his own sinewy but slender grasp; and she said with a smile—"Good-bye."

She was frightened lest he should possibly say more than she knew how to answer.

"And somehow it seems to me, I have a great deal to say."

"And I've a great deal to read, you see;" and she just stirred old Miss Wardle's letter, that lay open in her hand, with a smile just the least in the world of comic distress.

"A great deal," he said.

"And farewell, again," said Lillias.

"Farewell! dear Miss Lily."

And then, he just looked his old strange look upon her, and he went; and she dropped her eyes upon the letter. He had got into the far meadow, where the path makes a little turn round the clump of poplars, and hides itself. Just there he looked over his shoulder, a last look it might be, the handsome strange creature that had made so many of her hours pass so pleasantly. She knew a look would call him back—back, maybe, to her feet; but she could not give that little sign. There she stood, affecting to read that letter, one word of which she did not see. "She does not care ; but—but there's no one like her. No—she does not care." He thought ; and she let him think it : but her heart swelled to her throat, and she felt as if she could have screamed, " Come back—my only love—my darling—without you I must die !" But she did not raise her head. She only read on, steadily, old Miss Wardle's letter—over and over—the same half dozen lines. And when, after five minutes more, she lifted up her eyes, the hoaty poplars were ruffling their thick leaves in the breeze—and he was gone.

---

CHAPTER XXXV.

NARRATING HOW MISS LILIAS VISITED BELMONT, AND
SAW A STRANGE COCKED-HAT IN THE SHADOW BY THE WINDOW.

WHEN Lily reached home, she hardly knew how it was, but she felt lonesome and restless. Dr. Walsingham was absent for a day, and she thought a visit to Belmont would cheer her for awhile.

At that time, in every hall of gentility, there stood a sedan-chair, the property of the lady of the house ; and by the time the chairmen had got the poles into their places, and trusty John Tracy had got himself into his brown surtout, trimmed with white lace, and his cane in his hand—(there was no need of a lantern, for the moon shone softly and pleasantly down)—Lily Walsingham drew her red riding hood about her pretty face, and stepped into the chair ; and so the door shut, the roof closed in, and the young lady was fairly under weigh. She had so much to think of, so much to tell about her day's adventure, that before she thought she had come half of the way, they were flitting under the shadows of the poplars that grew beside the avenue; and through the window, she saw the hospitable house spreading out its white front as they drew near, and opening its wing to embrace her.

The hall-door stood half open, though it had been dark some time; and the dogs came down with a low growl, and plenty of sniffing, which forthwith turned into a solemn wagging of tails, for they were intimate with the chairmen, and with John Tracy, and loved Lillas too. So she got out in the hall, and went into the little room at the right, and opening the door of the inner and larger one—there was no candle there, and 'twas nearly dark—saw Gertrude standing by the window which looked out on the lawn toward the river. That side of the house was in shade, but she saw that the window was thrown up, and Gertrude, she thought, was looking toward her, though she did not move, until she drew nearer, wondering why she did not approach, and then, pausing in a kind of unpleasant doubt, she heard a murmured talking, and plainly saw the figure of a man, with a cloak, it seemed, wrapped about him, and leaning, from outside, against the window-sill, and, as she believed, holding Gertrude's hand.

The thing that impressed her most was the sharp outline of the cocked hat, with the corners so peculiarly pinched in, and the feeling that she had never seen that particular hat before in the parish of Chapelizod.

Lily made a step backward, and Gertrude instantly turned round, and seeing her, uttered a little scream.

"'Tis I, Gertrude, darling—Lily—Lily Walsingham," she said, perhaps as much dismayed as Gertrude herself; "I'll return in a moment."

She saw the figure, outside, glide hurriedly away by the side of the wall.

"Lily—Lily, darling, no, don't go—I did not expect you ;" and Gertrude stopped suddenly, and then as suddenly said—

"You are very welcome, Lily ;" and she drew the window down, and there was another pause before she said—"Had not we better go up to the drawing-room, and—and—Lily darling, you're very welcome. Are you better ?"

And she took little Lily's hand, and kissed her.

Little Lili as all this time had said nothing, so entirely was she disconcerted. And her heart beat fast with a kind of fear ; and she felt Gertrude's cold hand trembling a good deal in her's.

"Yes, darling, the drawing room, certainly," answered Lily. And the two young ladies went upstairs holding hands, and without exchanging another word.

Gertrude looked so pale and wretchedly, and Lily saw her eyes, wild and clouded, once or twice steal toward her with a glance of such dark alarm and inquiry, that she was totally unable to keep up the semblance of their old merry gossiping talk, and felt that Gertrude read in her face the amazement and fear which possessed her.

"Lily, darling, let us sit near the window, far away from the candles, and look out ; I hate the light."

"With all my heart," said Lily. And two paler faces than theirs, that night, did not look out on the moonlight prospect.

"I hate the light, Lily," repeated Gertrude, not looking at her companion, but directly out through the bow-window upon the dark outline of the lawn and river bank and the high grounds on the other side. "I hate the light—yes, I hate the light, because my thoughts are darkness—yes, my thoughts are darkness. No human being knows me ; and I feel like a person who is haunted. Tell me what you saw when you came into the parlor just now."

"Gertrude, dear, I ought not to have come in so suddenly."

CHAPTER XXXV.

SHOWING HOW SOME OF THE FEUDS IN CHAPELIZED
WAXED FIERCE, AND OTHERS WERE SOLEMNLY
CONDONED.

By this time little Dr. Toole had stepped into the Club, after his wont, as he passed the Phoenix. Sturk was playing draughts with old Arthur Slowe, and Dangerfield, erect and grim, was looking on the game, over his shoulder. Toole and Sturk were more distant and cold in their intercourse of late. The fact was, these two gentlemen had been very near exchanging pistol shots, or sword thrusts, only a week or two before; and all about the unconscious gentleman who was smiling in his usual pleasant fashion over the back of Sturk's chair. So Dangerfield's little dyspepsy had like to have cured one or other of the village leeches, for ever and a day, of the heart-ache and all other aches that flesh is heir to. For Dangerfield commenced with Toole; and that physician, on the third day of his instalment, found that Sturk had stept in and taken his patient bodily out of his hands.

Toole quite forgave Dangerfield. That gentleman gave him to understand that his ministrations were much more to his mind than those of his rival. But—and this was conveyed in strict confidence—this change was put upon him by a—a—in fact a nobleman—Lord Castlemallard—with whom, just now, Dr. Sturk can do a great deal; “and you know I can't quarrel with my Lord. It has pained me, I assure you, very much ; and to say truth, whoever applied to him to interfere in the matter, was, in my mind, guilty of an impertinence, though, as you see, I can't resent it."

And positively, only for Aunt Becky, who was always spoiling this sort of sport, and who restrained the gallant Toole by a peremptory injunction, there would have been, in Nutter's unfortunate phrase, "wigs on the green," next day.

So these gentlemen met on the terms I've described ; and Nutter's antipathy also, had waxed stronger and fiercer. And indeed, since Dangerfield's arrival, and Sturk's undisguised endeavours to ingratiate himself with Lord Castle-mallard, and push him from his stool, they had by consent ceased to speak to one another. On the other hand, if some feuds grew blacker and fiercer by time, there were others which were Christianly condoned ; foremost among which was the mortal quarrel between Nutter and O'Flaherty. On the evening of their memorable meeting on the Fifteen Acres, Puddock dined out, and O'Flaherty was too much exhausted to take any steps toward a better understanding. But on the night following, when the Club had their grand supper in King William's parlor, it was arranged with Nutter that a gentlemanlike reconciliation was to take place ; and accordingly, about nine o'clock, at which time Nutter's arrival was expected, Puddock, accompanied by O'Flaherty, big with his speech, entered the spacious parlor.

When they came in there was a chorus of laughter ringing round, with a clapping of hands, and a Babel of hilarious applause ; and Tom Toole was seen in the centre, sitting upon the floor, hugging his knees, with his drawn sword under his arm, his eyes turned up to the ceiling, and a contortion so unspeakably ludicrous upon his queer little face, as was very near causing little Puddock to explode in an unseemly burst of laughter.

Toole bounded to his feet in an instant, adjusting his wig

Miss Wardle's letter in her hand, full, of course, of shocking anecdotes about lunatics, and the sufferings of Fleet prisoners, and all the statistics, and inquiries, and dry little commissions, with which that worthy lady's correspondence abounded. It was open in her hand, and rustled sharp and stiffly in the air, but it was not inviting just then. From that point it was always a pretty look down or up the river; and her eyes followed with the flow of its waters towards Inchicore. And just at that moment she heard a sweet tenor, with a gaiety somehow pathetic, sing not far away the words she remembered—

"And she smiled upon the stream,
Like one that smiles at folly,
A dreamer on a dream,"

Devereux was coming—it was his playful salutation. Her large eyes dropped to the ground with the matchless blush of youth. She was strangely glad, but vexed at having changed color; but when he came up with her, in the deep shadow thrown by the old pier, with its thick festooneries, he could not tell, he only knew she looked beautiful.

"My dreams take wing, but my follies will not leave me. And you have been ill, Miss Lillias?"

"Oh, nothing; only a little cold."

"And I am going—I only knew last night—really going away." He paused; but the young lady did not feel called upon to say anything, and only allowed him to go on. "And I've a great mind, now that I'm departing this little world;" and he glanced, it seemed to her, regretfully towards the village; "to put you down, Miss Lily, if you will allow it, in my codicil for a legacy"—

She laughed a pleasant little careless laugh.

"Then, I suppose, if you were not to see me for some time, or maybe for ever, the village folks won't break their hearts after Dick Devereux."

And the Gipsy Captain smiled, and his eyes threw a soft violet shadow down upon her; and there was that in his tone which for a moment touched her with a strange reproach, like a bar of sweet music.

"Break our hearts? Not all, perhaps; but of course I—the parson's daughter—I should, and old Moore, the barber, and Pat Moran, the hackney coachman, and Mrs. Irons, your fat landlady, you've been so very good to all of us, you know."

"Well," he interrupted, "I've left my white surtout to Moran; a hat, let me see, and a pair of buckles to Moore; and my glass and china, to dear Mrs. Irons."

"Hat—buckles—surtout—glass—china—gone! Then it seems to me your earthly possessions are pretty nearly disposed of, and your worldly cares at an end."

"Yes; very nearly, but not quite," he laughed. "I have one treasure left—my poor monkey; he's a wonderful fellow—he has travelled half over the world, and is a perfect fine gentleman—and my true comrade until now. Do you think Dr. Walsingham, of his charity, would give the poor fellow free quarters at the Elms?"

She was going to make answer with a jest, satirically; but her mood changed quickly. It was, she thought, saucy of Captain Devereux to fancy that she should care to have his pet; and she answered a little gravely—

"I can't say, indeed; had you cared to see him, you might have asked him; but indeed, Captain Devereux, I believe you're jesting."

"Faith! madam, I believe I am; or, it does not much matter—dreaming perhaps. I said I had but one treasure left," he continued, with a fierce sort of tenderness that was peculiar to him: "and I did not mean to tell you, but I will. Look at that Miss Lily, 'tis the little rose you left on your harpsichord this morning. I stole it: 'tis mine; and Richard Devereux would die rather than lose it to another."

So then, after all, he had been at the Elms; and she had wronged him.

"You are, then, really going?" she said, so that no one would have guessed how strangely she felt at that moment.

"Yes, really going," he said, quite in his own way; "Over the hills and far away; and so, I know, you'll first wish your old friend, God speed."

"I do, indeed."

"And then you'll shake hands, Miss Lily, as in old times."

And out came the frank little hand, and he looked on it, with a darkling smile, as it lay in his own sinewy but slender grasp; and she said with a smile—"Good-bye."

She was frightened lest he should possibly say more than she knew how to answer.

"And somehow it seems to me, I have a great deal to say."

"And I've a great deal to read, you see;" and she just stirred old Miss Wardle's letter, that lay open in her hand, with a smile just the least in the world of comic distress.

"A great deal," he said.

"And farewell, again," said Lillias.

"Farewell! dear Miss Lily."

And then, he just looked his old strange look upon her, and he went; and she dropped her eyes upon the letter. He had got into the far meadow, where the path makes a little turn round the clump of poplars, and hides itself. Just there he looked over his shoulder, a last look it might be, the handsome strange creature that had made so many of her hours pass so pleasantly. She knew a look would call him back—back, maybe, to her feet; but she could not give that little sign. There she stood, affecting to read that letter, one word of which she did not see. "She does not care ; but—but there's no one like her. No—she does not care." He thought ; and she let him think it : but her heart swelled to her throat, and she felt as if she could have screamed, " Come back—my only love—my darling—without you I must die !" But she did not raise her head. She only read on, steadily, old Miss Wardle's letter—over and over—the same half dozen lines. And when, after five minutes more, she lifted up her eyes, the hoary poplars were ruffling their thick leaves in the breeze—and he was gone.

---

CHAPTER XXXV.

NARRATING HOW MISS LILIAS VISITED BELMONT, AND
SAW A STRANGE COCKED-HAT IN THE SHADOW BY THE WINDOW.

WHEN Lily reached home, she hardly knew how it was, but she felt lonesome and restless. Dr. Walsingham was absent for a day, and she thought a visit to Belmont would cheer her for awhile.

At that time, in every hall of gentility, there stood a sedan-chair, the property of the lady of the house ; and by the time the chairmen had got the poles into their places, and trusty John Tracy had got himself into his brown surtout, trimmed with white lace, and his cane in his hand—(there was no need of a lantern, for the moon shone softly and pleasantly down)—Lily Walsingham drew her red riding hood about her pretty face, and stepped into the chair ; and so the door shut, the roof closed in, and the young lady was fairly under weigh. She had so much to think of, so much to tell about her day's adventure, that before she thought she had come half of the way, they were flitting under the shadows of the poplars that grew beside the avenue; and through the window, she saw the hospitable house spreading out its white front as they drew near, and opening its wing to embrace her.

The hall-door stood half open, though it had been dark some time; and the dogs came down with a low growl, and plenty of sniffing, which forthwith turned into a solemn wagging of tails, for they were intimate with the chairmen, and with John Tracy, and loved Lilies too. So she got out in the hall, and went into the little room at the right, and opening the door of the inner and larger one—there was no candle there, and 'twas nearly dark—saw Gertrude standing by the window which looked out on the lawn toward the river. That side of the house was in shade, but she saw that the window was thrown up, and Gertrude, she thought, was looking toward her, though she did not move, until she drew nearer, wondering why she did not approach, and then, pausing in a kind of unpleasant doubt, she heard a murmured talking, and plainly saw the figure of a man, with a cloak, it seemed, wrapped about him, and leaning, from outside, against the window-sill, and, as she believed, holding Gertrude's hand.

The thing that impressed her most was the sharp outline of the cocked hat, with the corners so peculiarly pinched in, and the feeling that she had never seen that particular hat before in the parish of Chapelizod.

Lily made a step backward, and Gertrude instantly turned round, and seeing her, uttered a little scream.

"'Tis I, Gertrude, darling—Lily—Lily Walsingham," she said, perhaps as much dismayed as Gertrude herself; "I'll return in a moment."

She saw the figure, outside, glide hurriedly away by the side of the wall.

"Lily—Lily, darling, no, don't go—I did not expect you ;" and Gertrude stopped suddenly, and then as suddenly said—

"You are very welcome, Lily ;" and she drew the window down, and there was another pause before she said—"Had not we better go up to the drawing-room, and—and—Lily darling, you're very welcome. Are you better ?"

And she took little Lily's hand, and kissed her.

Little Lillias all this time had said nothing, so entirely was she disconcerted. And her heart beat fast with a kind of fear ; and she felt Gertrude's cold hand trembling a good deal in her's.

• "Yes, darling, the drawing room, certainly," answered Lily. And the two young ladies went upstairs holding hands, and without exchanging another word.

Gertrude looked so pale and wretchedly, and Lily saw her eyes, wild and clouded, once or twice steal toward her with a glance of such dark alarm and inquiry, that she was totally unable to keep up the semblance of their old merry-gossiping talk, and felt that Gertrude read in her face the amazement and fear which possessed her.

"Lily, darling, let us sit near the window, far away from the candles, and look out ; I hate the light."

"With all my heart," said Lily. And two paler faces than theirs, that night, did not look out on the moonlight prospect.

"I hate the light, Lily," repeated Gertrude, not looking at her companion, but directly out through the bow-window upon the dark outline of the lawn and river bank and the high grounds on the other side. "I hate the light—yes, I hate the light, because my thoughts are darkness—yes, my thoughts are darkness. No human being knows me ; and I feel like a person who is haunted. Tell me what you saw when you came into the parlor just now."

"Gertrude, dear, I ought not to have come in so suddenly."

"Yes, 'twas but right—'twas but kind in you, Lily—right and kind—to treat me like the open-hearted and intimate friend that, heaven knows, I was to you, Lily, all my life. I think—at least, I think—till lately—but you were always franker than I—and truer. You've have walked in the light Lily, and that's the way to peace. I turned aside, and walked in mystery; and it seems to me I am treading now the valley of the shadow of death. And what did you see, Lily—I know you'll tell me truly—when you came into the parlor, as I stood by the window?"

"I saw, I think, the form of a man in a cloak and hat, as I believe, talking with you in whispers, Gertrude, from without."

"The form of a man, Lily—you're right—not a man, but the form of a man," she continued, bitterly; "for it seems to me sometimes it can be no human fascination that has brought me under the tyranny in which I can scarce be said to breathe."

After an interval she said—

"It will seem incredible. You've heard of Mr. Dangerfield's proposal, and you've heard how I've received it. Well, listen."

"Gertrude, dear!" said Lily, who was growing frightened.

"I'm going," interrupted Miss Chatterworth, "to tell you my strange, if you will, but not guilty—no, not guilty—secret. I'm no agent now, but simply passive in the matter. But you must first pledge me your sacred word word that neither to my father nor to your's, nor to my aunt, nor to any living being, will you ever reveal what I'm about to tell you, till I have released you from your promise."

Did ever woman refuse a secret? Well, Lily wavered for a moment. But then suddenly stooping down, and kissing her, she said—

"No, Gertrude darling—you'll not be vexed with me—but you must not tell me your secret. You have excuses such as I should not have—you've been drawn into this concealment, step by step, unwillingly ; but, Gertrude, darling, I must not hear it, I could not look Aunt Becky in the face, nor the kind General, knowing that I was"—

She tried to find a work.

"Deceiving them, Lily," said Gertrude, with a moan.

"Yes, Gertrude, darling." And she kissed her again. "And maybe to your great hurt. But I thank you all the same from my heart for your confidence and love ; and I'm gladder than you'll ever know, Gerty, that they are still the same." And thus the two girls kissed silently and fervently, and poor Gertrude Chatterworth wept uncomplainingly, looking out upon the dark prospect.

"And you'll tell me, darling, when you are happier, as you soon will be ?" said Lily.

"I will—I will, indeed. I'm sometimes happier—sometimes quite happy—but I'm very low to-night, Lily," answered she.

Then Lily comforted and caressed her friend. And I must confess she was very curious, too, and nothing but a strange sense of terror, and a feeling of danger and guilt in merely possessing a secret under such terms, withheld her from hearing Gertrude's confessions. But on her way home she thanked Heaven for her resolution, and was quite sure that she was happier and better for it.

---

CHAPTER XXXV.

SHOWING HOW SOME OF THE FEUDS IN CHAPELIZED
WAXED FIERCEER, AND OTHERS WERE SOLEMNLY
CONDONED.

By this time little Dr. Toole had stepped into the Club, after his wont, as he passed the Phoenix. Sturk was playing draughts with old Arthur Slowe, and Dangerfield, erect and grim, was looking on the game, over his shoulder. Toole and Sturk were more distant and cold in their intercourse of late. The fact was, these two gentlemen had been very near exchanging pistol shots, or sword thrusts, only a week or two before; and all about the unconscious gentleman who was smiling in his usual pleasant fashion over the back of Sturk's chair. So Dangerfield's little dyspepsy had like to have cured one or other of the village leeches, for ever and a day, of the heart-ache and all other aches that flesh is heir to. For Dangerfield commenced with Toole; and that physician, on the third day of his instalment, found that Sturk had slept in and taken his patient bodily out of his hands.

Toole quite forgave Dangerfield. That gentleman gave him to understand that his ministrations were much more to his mind than those of his rival. But—and this was conveyed in strict confidence—this change was put upon him by a—a—in fact a nobleman—Lord Castlemallard—with whom, just now, Dr. Sturk can do a great deal; “and you know I can't quarrel with my Lord. It has pained me, I assure you, very much ; and to say truth, whoever applied to him to interfere in the matter, was, in my mind, guilty of an impertinence, though, as you see, I can't resent it."

And positively, only for Aunt Becky, who was always spoiling this sort of sport, and who restrained the gallant Toole by a peremptory injunction, there would have been, in Nutter's unfortunate phrase, "wigs on the green," next day.

So these gentlemen met on the terms I've described ; and Nutter's antipathy also, had waxed stronger and fiercer. And indeed, since Dangerfield's arrival, and Sturk's undisguised endeavours to ingratiate himself with Lord Castle-mallard, and push him from his stool, they had by consent ceased to speak to one another. On the other hand, if some feuds grew blacker and fiercer by time, there were others which were Christianly condoned ; foremost among which was the mortal quarrel between Nutter and O'Flaherty. On the evening of their memorable meeting on the Fifteen Acres, Puddock dined out, and O'Flaherty was too much exhausted to take any steps toward a better understanding. But on the night following, when the Club had their grand supper in King William's parlor, it was arranged with Nutter that a gentlemanlike reconciliation was to take place ; and accordingly, about nine o'clock, at which time Nutter's arrival was expected, Puddock, accompanied by O'Flaherty, big with his speech, entered the spacious parlor.

When they came in there was a chorus of laughter ringing round, with a clapping of hands, and a Babel of hilarious applause ; and Tom Toole was seen in the centre, sitting upon the floor, hugging his knees, with his drawn sword under his arm, his eyes turned up to the ceiling, and a contortion so unspeakably ludicrous upon his queer little face, as was very near causing little Puddock to explode in an unseemly burst of laughter.

Toole bounded to his feet in an instant, adjusting his wig and eyeing the new comers with intense but uneasy solemnity, which produced some suppressed merriment among the company.

It was well for the serenity of the village that O'Flaherty was about to make a little speech—a situation which usually deprived him of half his wits. Still, with the suspicion of conscious weakness, he read something affecting himself in the general buzz and countenance of the assembly; and said to Devereux, on purpose loud enough for Toole to hear—“Ensign Puddock and myself would be proud to know what was the divarting tom-foolery going on upon the floor, and for which we arrived unfortunately a little too leet?”

“Tom-foolery, sir, is an unpleasant word!” cried the little Doctor, firing up, for he was a game-cock.

“Tom Toolery he means,” interposed Devereux, “the pleasantest word, on the contrary, in Chapelizod. Pray, allow me to say a word a degree more serious. I'm commissioned, Lieutenant Puddock and Lieutenant O'Flaherty” (a bow to each), “by Mr. Mahony, who acted the part of second to Mr Nutter, on the recent occasion, to pray that you'll be so obliging as to accept his apology for not being present at this, as we all hope, most agreeable meeting. Our reverend friend, Father Roach, whose guest he had the honor to be, can tell you more precisely the urgent nature of the business on which he departed.”

Father Roach tried to stop the Captain with a reproachful glance, but that unfeeling officer fairly concluded his sentence notwithstanding, with a wave of his hand and a bow to the cleric; and sitting down at the same moment, left him in possession of the chair.

The fact was, that at an unreasonable hour that morning three bailiffs introduced themselves by a stratagem into the Reverend Father's domicile, and nabbed the high-souled Patrick Mahony, as he slumbered peacefully in his bed, to the terror of the simple maid who let them in.

"At whose suit?" inquired the generous outlaw, sitting up among the blankets.

"Mrs. Elizabeth Woolly, relict and administratrix of the late Mr. Timotheus Woolly, of High street, in the city of Dublin, tailor," responded the choragus of the officers.

So away he went, to the good-natured ecclesiastic's grief, promising, nevertheless, with a disconsolate affectation of cheerfulness, that all should be settled, and he under the Priest's roof-tree again before night.

"I don't—exactly—know the nature of the business, gentlemen," said Father Roach, with considerable hesitation.

"Urgent, however, it was—wasn't it?" said Devereux.

"Urgent—well; certainly—a—and"—

"Thay no more thir," said little Puddock, to the infinite relief of the reverend father, who flung another look of reproach at Devereux, and muttered his indignation to himself, "I'm perfectly satisfied; and so I venture to thay, its Lieutenant O'Flaherty"—

"Is not he going to say something to Nutter?" inquired Devereux.

"Yeth," whispered Puddock, "I hope he'll get through it. I—I wrote a few thententhes mythelf; but he'th by no meanth perfect—in fact, between ourselves, he's a somewhat slow study."

"Suppose you purge his head again, Puddock?" Puddock did not choose to hear the suggestion; but Nutter, in reply to a complimentary speech from Puddock, declared, in two or three words, his readiness to meet Lieutenant O'Flaherty half-way; "and curse me, sir, if I know, at this moment, what I did or said to offend him."

Then came a magnanimous, but nearly unintelligible speech from O'Flaherty, prompted by little Puddock, who, being responsible for the composition, was more nervous during the delivery of that remarkable oration, than the speaker himself; and "thuffered indethericably" at hearing his periods mangled ; and had actually to hold O'Flaherty by the arm, and whisper in an agony—"not yet—curthe it—not yet"—to prevent the incorrigible Fireworker from stretching forth his boney red hand before he had arrived at that most effective passage which Puddock afterwards gave so well in private for Dick Devereux, beginning, "and thus I greet"—

Thus was there a perfect reconciliation, and the gentlemen of the club, Toole included, were more than ever puzzled to understand the origin of the quarrel, for Puddock kept O'Flaherty's secret magnificently, and peace prevailed in O'Flaherty's breast.

---

CHAPTER XXXVI.

DREAMS AND TROUBLES, AND A DARK LOOK-OUT.

So there was no feud in the Club worth speaking of but those of which Dr. Sturk was the centre ; and Toole remarked this night that Sturk looked very ill—and so, in truth, he did ; and it was plain, too, that his mind was not in the game, for old Slowe, who used not to have a chance with him, beat him three times running, which incensed Sturk, as small things will a man who is in the slow fever of a secret trouble. He threw down the three shillings he had lost with more force than was necessary, and muttering a curse, clapped on his hat and took up a newspaper at another table, with a rather flushed face. He happened to light upon a dolorous appeal to those "whom Providence hath blessed with riches," on behalf of a gentleman "who had once held a commission under his Majesty, and was now on a sudden by some unexpected turns of fortune, reduced, with his unhappy wife and five small children, to want of bread, and implored of his prosperous fellow-citizens that charitable relief which, till a few months since, it was his custom and pleasure to dispense to others." And this stung him with a secret pang of insecurity and horror. So he pitched down the newspaper and walked across to his own house, with his hands in his pockets, and thought again of Dangerfield, and who the deuce he could be, or whether he had really ever, anywhere—in the body or in the spirit—encountered him, as he used to feel with a boding vagueness he had done. And then those accursed dreams: he was not relieved as he expected by disclosing them. The sense of an ominous meaning pointing at him in all their grotesque images and scenery, still haunted him.

"Parson Walsingham, with all his reading," his mind muttered, as it were, to itself, "is no better than an old woman; and that knave and buffoon, Mr. Apothecary Toole, looked queer, the spiteful dog, just to disquiet me. I wonder at Dr. Walsingham, though. A sensible man would have laughed me into spirits. On my soul, I think he believes in dreams." And Sturk laughed within himself scornfully. It was all affectation, and addressed strictly to himself, who saw through it all; but still he practised it. "If these infernal losses had not come to spoil my stomach, I should not have remembered them, much less let them haunt me this way, like a cursed file of ghosts. I'll try gentian to-morrow."

Everything and everyone was poking at the one point of his secret fears. Dr. Walsingham preached a sermon upon the text, "remember the days of darkness for they are many." It went over the tremendous themes of death and judgment in the rector's own queer, solemn, measured way, and all the day after rang in Sturk's ear as the drums and fifes in the muffled peal of the dead march used to do long ago, before its ear grew familiar with its thrilling roll. Sermons usually affected Sturk no more than they did other military gentlemen. But he was in a morbid state; and in this, one or two terms or phrases, nothing in themselves, happened to touch upon a sensitive and secret centre of pain in the Doctor's soul.

One of that ugly brood of dreams which haunted his nights borrowed, perhaps, a hint from Dr. Walsingham's sermon. Sturk thought he heard Toole's well-known, brisk voice, under his windows, exclaim, "What is the dirty beggar doing there? faugh!—he smells all over like carrion—ha, ha, ha!" and looking out, in his dream, from his drawing-room window, he saw a squallid mendicant begging alms at his hall-door. "Hollo, you, sir; what do you want there?" cried the Surgeon, with a sort of unaccountable antipathy and fear. "He lost his last shilling in the great bankruptcy, in October," answered Dunstan's voice behind his ear; and in the earth-colored face which the beggar turned up towards him, Sturk recognised his own features—" 'Tis I"—he gasped out, with an oath, and awoke in a horror, not knowing where he was. "I—I'm dying."

"October," thought Sturk—"bankruptcy. 'Tis just because I'm always thinking of that infernal bill, and old Dyle's renewal, and the rent."

Indeed, the Surgeon had a stormy look forward, and the navigation of October was so threatening, awful, and almost desperate, as he stood alone through the dreadful watches at the helm, with hot cheek and unsteady hand, trusting stoically to luck, and hoping against hope, that rocks would melt, and the sea cease from drowning, that it was almost a wonder he did not leap overboard, only for the certainty of a cold head and a quiet heart, and one deep sleep.

And, then, he used to tot up his liabilities for that accursed month, near whose yawning verge he already stood; and then think of every penny coming to him, and what might be rescued and wrung from runaways and bankrupts whose bills he held, and whom he used to curse in his bed, with his fists and his teeth clenched, when poor little Mrs. Sturk, knowing nought of this danger, and having said her prayers, lay sound asleep by his side. Then he used to think, if he could only get the agency in time it would set him up—he could borrow £200 the day after his appointment; and he must make a push, and extend his practice. It was ridiculous, that blackguard little Toole carrying off the best families in the neighborhood, and standing in the way of a man like him; and Nutter, too—why, Lord Castlemallard knew as well as he did, that Nutter was not fit to manage the property, and that he was—and Nutter without a child or any one, and he with seven!" Then Nutter would be down upon him, without mercy for the rent; and Dangerfield, if, indeed, he cared to do it, [curse it, he trusted nobody,] could not control him; and Lord Castlemallard, the selfish profligate, was away in Paris, leaving his business in the hands of that bitter old botch, who'd go any length to be the ruin of him.

Then the clock down stair would strike "three," and he felt thankful, with a great sigh, that so much of the night was over, and yet dreaded the morning.

And then he would con over his chances again, and think which was most likely to give him a month or two. Old Dyle—"Bah;—he's a stone, he would not give me an hour. Or Carny, curse him, unless Lucas would move him. And, no, Lucas is a rogue, selfish beast: he owes me his place; and I don't think he'd stir his finger to snatch me from perdition. Or Nutter—Nutter, indeed!—why that fiend has been waiting half the year round to put in his distress the first hour he can."

And then Sturk writhed round on his back, as we may suppose might St. Anthony on his gridiron, and rolled his eye-balls up toward the dark bed-tester, and uttered a dis-

your harpsichord this morning. I stole it: 'tis mine; and Richard Devereux would die rather than lose it to another."

So then, after all, he had been at the Elms; and she had wronged him.

"You are, then, really going?" she said, so that no one would have guessed how strangely she felt at that moment.

"Yes, really going," he said, quite in his own way; "Over the hills and far away; and so, I know, you'll first wish your old friend, God speed."

"I do, indeed."

"And then you'll shake hands, Miss Lily, as in old times."

And out came the frank little hand, and he looked on it, with a darkling smile, as it lay in his own sinewy but slender grasp; and she said with a smile—"Good-bye."

She was frightened lest he should possibly say more than she knew how to answer.

"And somehow it seems to me, I have a great deal to say."

"And I've a great deal to read, you see;" and she just stirred old Miss Wardle's letter, that lay open in her hand, with a smile just the least in the world of comic distress.

"A great deal," he said.

"And farewell, again," said Lillias.

"Farewell! dear Miss Lily."

And then, he just looked his old strange look upon her, and he went; and she dropped her eyes upon the letter. He had got into the far meadow, where the path makes a little turn round the clump of poplars, and hides itself. Just there he looked over his shoulder, a last look it might be, the handsome strange creature that had made so many of her hours pass so pleasantly. She knew a look would call him back—back, maybe, to her feet; but she could not give that little sign. There she stood, affecting to read that letter, one word of which she did not see. "She does

"And, true for you, so it is, my lady," said the elder woman, with another bob; "an' I won't delay you, ma'am, five minutes, if you plaze, an' its the likes of you," she said, in a shrewish aside, with a flash of her large eyes upon John Tracy, "that stands betune them that's willin' to be good and the poor—so yes do, saucepans and bonepolishers, bad luck to yes."

The younger woman plucked the elder by the skirt; but Lily did not hear. She was already in the parlor.

"Ay, there it is," grinned old John, with a wag of his head.

And so old Sally came forth and asked the women to step in, and set chairs for them, while Lily was taking off her gloves and hood by the table.

"You'll tell me first who you are," said Lily, "my good woman—for I don't think we've met before—and then you'll say what I can do for you."

"I'm the Widdy Glynn, ma'am, at your sarvice, that lives beyant Palmerstown, down by the ferry, af its playsin' to you; and this is my little girl, ma'am, av you plaze. Nan, look at the lady, you slut."

She did not need the exhortation, for she was, indeed, looking at the lady, with a curious and most melancholy gaze.

"An' what I'm goin' to say, my lady, if you plaze, id best be said alone;" and the matron glanced at old Sally, and bobbed another courtesy.

"Very well," said Miss Walsingham. "Sally, dear, the good woman wants to speak with me alone; so you may as well go and wait for me in my room."

And so the young lady stood alone in presence of her two visitors, whereupon, with a good many courtesies, and with great volubility, the elder dame commenced—

"'Tis what we heerd, ma'am, that Captain Devereux, of the Artillery here, in Ghapelizod, ma'am, that's gone to much to tell about her day's adventure, that before she thought she had come half of the way, they were flitting under the shadows of the poplars that grew beside the avenue; and through the window, she saw the hospitable house spreading out its white front as they drew near, and opening its wing to embrace her.

The hall-door stood half open, though it had been dark some time; and the dogs came down with a low growl, and plenty of sniffing, which forthwith turned into a solemn wagging of tails, for they were intimate with the chairmen, and with John Tracy, and loved Lilius too. So she got out in the hall, and went into the little room at the right, and opening the door of the inner and larger one—there was no candle there, and 'twas nearly dark—saw Gertrude standing by the window which looked out on the lawn toward the river. That side of the house was in shade, but she saw that the window was thrown up, and Gertrude, she thought, was looking toward her, though she did not move, until she drew nearer, wondering why she did not approach, and then, pausing in a kind of unpleasant doubt, she heard a murmured talking, and plainly saw the figure of a man, with a cloak, it seemed, wrapped about him, and leaning, from outside, against the window-sill, and, as she believed, holding Gertrude's hand.

The thing that impressed her most was the sharp outline of the cocked hat, with the corners so peculiarly pinched in, and the feeling that she had never seen that particular hat before in the parish of Chapelizod.

Lily made a step backward, and Gertrude instantly turned round, and seeing her, uttered a little scream.

"'Tis I, Gertrude, darling—Lily—Lily Walsingham," she said, perhaps as much dismayed as Gertrude herself; "I'll return in a moment."

She saw the figure, outside, glide hurriedly away by the side of the wall.

you, Miss, the desaver, for he'd charum the birds off the trees, the parjurer; and I'll tell his Raverence all about it when I see him, in the morning—for 'tis only right he should know. Wish the lady good-night, Nan, you slut—an' the same from myself, ma'am."

And, with another courtesy, the Glynnys of Palmerstown withdrew.

---

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

OF A MESSENGER FROM CHAPELIZOD VAULT WHO WAITED
IN THE TYLED HOUSE FOR MR. MERVYN.

MERVYN was just about this time walking up the steep Ballyfermot road. It was then a lonely track, with great bushes and hedge-rows overhanging it; and as other emotions subsided, something of the chill and excitement of solitude stole over him. Themoon was wading through flecked masses of cloud. The breath of night rustled lightly through the bushes, and seemed to follow his steps with a strange sort of sigh and titter. He stopt and looked back under the branches of an old thorn, and traced against the dark horizon the still darker outline of the ivied church tower of Chapelizod, and thought of the dead that lay there, and of all those sealed lips might tell, and old tales of strange meetings on moors and desolate places with departed spirits flitted across his brain; and the melancholy rush of the night air swept close about his ears, and he turned and walked more briskly towards his own gloomy quarters, passing the church-yard of Ballyfermot on his right; and then at last he sighted the pale, peeping front of the "Tyled House," through the close and dismal avenue of elms. There was no glimmer of light from the lower windows, not even the

"Yes, 'twas but right—'twas but kind in you, Lily—right and kind—to treat me like the open-hearted and intimate friend that, heaven knows, I was to you, Lily, all my life. I think—at least, I think—till lately—but you were always franker than I—and truer. You've have walked in the light Lily, and that's the way to peace. I turned aside, and walked in mystery; and it seems to me I am treading now the valley of the shadow of death. And what did you see, Lily—I know you'll tell me truly—when you came into the parlor, as I stood by the window?"

"I saw, I think, the form of a man in a cloak and hat, as I believe, talking with you in whispers, Gertrude, from without."

"The form of a man, Lily—you're right—not a man, but the form of a man," she continued, bitterly; "for it seems to me sometimes it can be no human fascination that has brought me under the tyranny in which I can scarce be said to breathe."

After an interval she said—

"It will seem incredible. You've heard of Mr. Dangerfield's proposal, and you've heard how I've received it. Well, listen."

"Gertrude, dear!" said Lily, who was growing frightened.

"I'm going," interrupted Miss Chatterworth, "to tell you my strange, if you will, but not guilty—no, not guilty—secret. I'm no agent now, but simply passive in the matter. But you must first pledge me your sacred word word that neither to my father nor to your's, nor to my aunt, nor to any living being, will you ever reveal what I'm about to tell you, till I have released you from your promise."

Did ever woman refuse a secret? Well, Lily wavered for a moment. But then suddenly stooping down, and kissing her, she said—

"No, Gertrude darling—you'll not be vexed with me—but you must not tell me your secret. You have excuses such as I should not have—you've been drawn into this concealment, step by step, unwillingly; but, Gertrude, darling, I must not hear it, I could not look Aunt Becky in the face, nor the kind General, knowing that I was"—

She tried to find a work.

"Deceiving them, Lily," said Gertrude, with a moan.

"Yes, Gertrude, darling." And she kissed her again.

"And maybe to your great hurt. But I thank you all the same from my heart for your confidence and love; and I'm gladder than you'll ever know, Gerty, that they are still the same." And thus the two girls kissed silently and fervently, and poor Gertrude Chatterworth wept uncomplainingly, looking out upon the dark prospect.

"And you'll tell me, darling, when you are happier, as you soon will be?" said Lily.

"I will—I will, indeed. I'm sometimes happier—sometimes quite happy—but I'm very low to-night, Lily," answered she.

Then Lily comforted and caressed her friend. And I must confess she was very curious, too, and nothing but a strange sense of terror, and a feeling of danger and guilt in merely possessing a secret under such terms, withheld her from hearing Gertrude's confessions. But on her way home she thanked Heaven for her resolution, and was quite sure that she was happier and better for it.

---

"I ask your pardon, Mr. Mervyn, I have a good deal to do, back and forward, sometimes early, sometimes late, in the church—Chapelizod Church—all alone, sir; and I often think of you, when I walk over the south-side vault."

"What's your message, I say, sir, and who sends it?" insisted Mervyn.

"Your father," answered Irons.

Mervyn looked with a black and wild sort of inquiry on the clerk, and seemed to swallow down a sort of horror, before his anger rose again.

"You're mistaken—my father's dead," he said, in a fierce but agitated undertone.

"He's dead, sir—yes," said his saturnine visitor, with the same faint smile and cynical quietude.

"Speak out, sirrah; whom do you come from?"

"The late Right Honorable the Lord Viscount Dunoran." He spoke, as I have said, a little thickly, like a man who had drunk his modicum of liquor.

"You've been drinking, and you dare to mix my—my father's name with your drunken dreams and babble—you wretched sot!"

"A naggin of whiskey, at the Salmon House, to rise my heart before I came here. I'm not drunk—that's sure." He answered, quite unmoved, like one speaking to himself.

"And—why—what can you mean by speaking of him?" repeated Mervyn, unaccountably agitated.

"I speak for him, sir, by your leave. Suppose he greets you with a message—and you don't care to hear it?"

"You're mad," whispered Mervyn, with an icy stare, to whom the whole colloquy began to shape itself into a dreadful dream.

"Belike you're mad, sir," answered Irons, in a grim, ugly tone, but with face unmoved. "'Twas not a light matter brought me here—a message—there—well!—your right honorable father, that lies in lead and oak, without a name you, very much ; and to say truth, whoever applied to him to interfere in the matter, was, in my mind, guilty of an impertinence, though, as you see, I can't resent it."

And positively, only for Aunt Becky, who was always spoiling this sort of sport, and who restrained the gallant Toole by a peremptory injunction, there would have been, in Nutter's unfortunate phrase, "wigs on the green," next day.

So these gentlemen met on the terms I've described ; and Nutter's antipathy also, had waxed stronger and fiercer. And indeed, since Dangerfield's arrival, and Sturk's undisguised endeavours to ingratiate himself with Lord Castle-mallard, and push him from his stool, they had by consent ceased to speak to one another. On the other hand, if some feuds grew blacker and fiercer by time, there were others which were Christianly condoned ; foremost among which was the mortal quarrel between Nutter and O'Flaherty. On the evening of their memorable meeting on the Fifteen Acres, Puddock dined out, and O'Flaherty was too much exhausted to take any steps toward a better understanding. But on the night following, when the Club had their grand supper in King William's parlor, it was arranged with Nutter that a gentlemanlike reconciliation was to take place ; and accordingly, about nine o'clock, at which time Nutter's arrival was expected, Puddock, accompanied by O'Flaherty, big with his speech, entered the spacious parlor.

When they came in there was a chorus of laughter ringing round, with a clapping of hands, and a Babel of hilarious applause ; and Tom Toole was seen in the centre, sitting upon the floor, hugging his knees, with his drawn sword under his arm, his eyes turned up to the ceiling, and a contortion so unspeakably ludicrous upon his queer little face, as was very near causing little Puddock to explode in an unseemly burst of laughter.

Toole bounded to his feet in an instant, adjusting his wig

all capable of compassion, you will kill me at a blow rather than trifle any longer with the terrible hope that has been my torture—I believe, my insanity all my life."

"Well, sir," said Irons, mildly, and with that serene suspicion of a smile on his face, "if you wish to talk to me you must take me different; for, to say truth, I was nearer killing you that time than you were aware, and all the time I mean you no harm! and yet, if I thought you were going to say to anybody living, Zekiel Irons, the clerk, was here on Tuesday night, I believe I'd shoot you now."

"You wish your visit secret: well, you have my honor, no one living shall hear of it," said Mervyn. "Go on."

"I've little to say, your honor; but, first, do you think your servants heard the noise, just now?"

"The old woman's deaf, and her daughter dare not stir after night-fall. You need fear no interruption."

"Ay, the house is haunted, but dead men tell no tales. 'Tis the living I fear. I thought it would be darker—the clouds broke up strangely, 'tis as much as my life's worth me to be seen near the Tyled House; and never you speak to me nor seem to know me when you chance to meet me, do you mind, sir?"

"'Tis agreed, there shall be no recognition," answered Mervyn.

"There's them watching me that can see in the clouds, or the running waters, what you're thinking of a mile away, that can move as soft as ghosts, and can grip as hard as hell, when need is. So be patient for a bit—I gave you the message—I tell you 'tis true; and as to my proving it at present, I can, you see, and I can't; but the hour is coming, only be patient, and swear, sir, upon your soul and honor, that you won't let me come to perdition by reason of speaking the truth."

"On my soul and honor, I mean it," answered Mervyn. "Go on."

"If you please, sir, no, not a word more till the time comes," answered Irons ; " I'll go as I came." And he shoved up the window-sash and got out lightly upon the grass, and glided away among the gigantic old fruit-trees and was lost before a minute.

Perhaps he came intending more. He had seemed for a while to have made up his mind, Mervyn thought, to a full disclosure, and then he hesitated, and, on second thoughts, drew back. Barren and tantalizing, however, as was this strange conference, it was yet worth worlds, as indicating the quarter from which information might ultimately be hoped for.

---

CHAPTER XXXIX.

IN WHICH THE RECTOR COMES HOME, AND LILY SPEAKS
HER MIND, AND TIME GLIDES ON, AND AUNT REBECCA CALLS AT THE ELMS.

NEXT morning, 'punctual at the early breakfast hour of those days, the cheery voice of the old Rector was heard at the garden rails that fronted the house, and out ran Tom Clinton, from the stable-yard, and bid his "Raverence," with homely phrase, and with a pleasant grin, "welcome home," and held his bridle and stirrup, while the Parson, with a kind smile, and half a dozen inquiries, and the air of a man who, having made a long journey and a distant sojourn, expands on beholding old faces and the sights of home again ; and Lilius ran to the garden-gate to meet him, with her old smile and greeting it seemed fonder and more tender than ever, and he patted her cheek and thought she looked a little pale, but would not say anything just then that was not altogether cheerful ; and so they stepped up the two or three yards of gravel walk—she at his right side, with her right hand in his and her left clinging by his arm, and nestling close by his side, and leading him up to the house like a beloved captive.

And so at breakfast he narrated all his adventures, and told who were at the dinner party, and described two fine ladies' dresses—for the Doctor had skill in millinery, though it was as little known as Don Quixote's talent for making bird-cages and tooth-picks. He told her his whole innocent little budget of gossip, in his own simple, pleasant way; and his little Lily sat looking on her beloved old man, and smiling, but saying little, and her eyes often filling with tears; and he looked when he chance to see it—wistfully and sadly for an instant, but he made no remark.

And some time after, as she happened to pass the study-door, he called her—"Little Lily, come here." And in she came; and there was the Doctor, all alone and erect before his bookshelves, plucking down a volume here, and putting up one there, and—

"Shut the door, little Lily," says he, gently and cheerily, going on with his work. "I had a letter, yesterday evening, my darling, from Captain Devereux, and he tells me that he's very much attached to you; and I don't wonder at his being in love with little Lily—he could not help it." And he laughed fondly, and was taking down a volume that rather stuck in his place, so he could not turn to look at her; for, the truth was, he supposed she was blushing, and could not bear to add to her confusion; and he, though he continued his homely work, and clapped the sides of his books together, and blew on their tops, and went so simply and plainly to the point, was flushed and very nervous himself.

"And he wants to marry my little Lily, if she'll have him. And what does my darling wish me to say to him;" and he spoke very cheerily.

"My darling, you're my darling; and your little Lily will never, never leave you. She'll stay." And here the little speech stopped, for she was crying, with her arms about his neck; and the old man cried, too, and smiled over her, and patted her gracious head, with a little trembling laugh, and said, "God bless you, my treasure."

"Well, little Lily, will you have him?" he said, after a little pause.

"No, my darling, no!" she answered, still crying.

"Well, little Lily, I won't answer his letter to-day; there's no hurry, you know. And, if you are of the same mind to-morrow, you can just say you wish me to write."

"Change, I can't; my answer will always be the same—always the same."

And she kissed him again, and went toward the door; but she turned back, drying her eyes, with a smile, and said—

"No, your little Lily will stay with her darling old man, and be a pleasant old maid, like Aunt Becky; and I'll play and sing you favorite airs, and Sally and I will keep the house; and we'll be happier in the Elms, I'm determined, than ever we were—and won't you call me, darling, when you're going out?"

So little Lily ran away, and up stairs; and as she left the study and its beloved tenant, at every step the air seemed to darken round her, and her heart to sink. And she turned the key in her door, and threw herself on the bed; and, with her face to the pillow, cried as if her heart would break.

So the summer had mellowed into autumn, and the fall of the leaf, and Devereux did not return; and, it was alleged in the club, on good authority, that he was appointed on the staff of the Commander of the Forces; and Puddock had a letter from him, dated in England, with little or no news in it; and Dr. Walsingham had a long epistle from Malaga, from honest Dan Loftus, full of Spanish matter for Irish history, and stating, with many regrets, that his honorable pupil had taken ill of a fever. And this bit of news speedily took wind, and was discussed at the club; and the odds were freely given and taken upon the event.

●The politics of Belmont were still pretty much in the old position. The General had not yet returned, and Aunt Rebecca and Gertrude fought pitched battles, as heretofore, on the subject of Dangerfield. That gentleman had carried so many points in his life by simple waiting, that he was nothing daunted by the obstacles which the caprice of the young lady presented to the immediate accomplishment of his plans.

So when Aunt Becky and Miss Gertrude at length agreed on an armistice—the condition being that the question of Mr. Dangerfield's bliss or misery was to stand over for judgment until the General's return, which could not now be deferred more than two or three weeks—the amorous swain, on being apprized of the terms by Aunt Rebecca, acquiesced with alacrity, in a handsome, neat, and gallant little speech, and kissed Aunt Rebecca's slender and jeweled hand, with a low bow and a grim smile, all which she received very graciously.

In the meantime Gertrude grew happier and more like herself, and Aunt Rebecca had her own theories about the real state of that young lady's affections, and her generally unsuspected relations with others.

Aunt Rebecca called at the Elms to see Lilius Walsingham, and sat down beside her on the sofa.

"Lily, child, you're not looking yourself. I'll send you some drops. You must positively nurse yourself. I'm almost sorry I did not bring Dr. Toole."

"Indeed I'm glad you did not, Aunt Becky; I take excellent care of myself. I have not been out for three whole days."

"And you must not budge, darling, while this east wind continues. D'ye mind? And what do you think, my dear, I do believe I've discovered the secret reason of Gertrude's repugnance to Mr. Dangerfield's most advantageous offer."

"Oh, indeed!" said Lily, becoming interested.

"Well, I suppose you suspected she had a secret?" said Aunt Rebecca.

"I can only say, dear Aunt Becky, she has not told it to me."

"Now, listen to me, my dear," said Aunt Becky, laying her fan upon Lily's arm. "So sure as you sit there, Gertrude likes some body, and I think I shall soon know who he is. Can you conjecture, my dear?" And Aunt Rebecca paused, looking, Lilius thought, rather pale, and with a kind of smile too.

"No," said Lilius; "no, I really can't."

"Well, maybe when I tell you I've reason to think he's one of our officers here. Eh? Can you guess?" said Aunt Becky, looking straight before her.

It was now Lily's turn to look pale for a moment, and then to blush so much that her ears tingled, and her eyes dropped to the carpet. She had time to recover though, for Aunt Becky, as I've said, was looking straight before her, a little pale, awaiting the result of Lily's presumed ruminations. A moment satisfied her it could not be Devereux, and she was soon quite herself again.

"An officer! no, Aunt Becky—there certainly is Captain Cluffe, who always joins your party when you and Gertrude go down to hear the band, and Lieutenant Puddock, too, who does the same—but you know"——

"Well, my dear, all in good time. Gertrude's very secret, and proud, too; but I shall know very soon. I've ascertained, my dear, that an officer came under the window the other evening, and sang a verse of a French chanson, from the meadow, in a cloak, if you please, with a guitar. I could name his name, my dear"——

"Do, pray, tell me," said Lily, whose curiosity was all alive.

"Why—a—not yet, my dear," answered Aunt Becky, looking down ; " there are—there's a reason—but the affair, I may tell you, began, in earnest, on the evening on which she refused Mr. Mervyn. But I forgot that you did not know that either—however, you'll never mention it." And she kissed her cheek, calling her " my wise little Lily."

" And, my dear, it has been going on so regularly ever since, with, till very lately, so little disguise, that I only wonder everybody doesn't see it as plain as I do myself ; and Lily, my dear, continued Aunt Rebecca, energetically, rising from the sofa, as some object caught her eye through the glass-door in the garden, " your beautiful roses are all trailing in the mud. What on earth is Hogan about ? and there, see, just at the door, a boxful of nails !—I'd nail his ear to the wall if he were mine," and Aunt Rebecca glanced sharply through the glass, this way and that, for the offending gardener, who, happily, did not appear. Then off went Aunt Becky to something else ; and in a little time remembered the famous academy in Martin's-row, and looking at her watch, took her leave in a prodigious hurry, and followed by Dominick, in full livery, and two dogs, left Lillias again to the society of her own sad thoughts.

---

CHAPTER XL.

IN WHICH DR. STURK TRIES THIS WAY AND THAT FOR A REPREIVE ON THE EVE OF EXECUTION.

So time crept on, and the day arrived when Sturk must pay his rent, or take the ugly consequences. The day before he spent in Dublin financiering. It was galling and barren work. He had to ask favors of fellows whom he hated, and to stand their refusals, and pretend to believe their lying excuses, and appear to make quite light of it, though every failure stunned him like a blow of a bludgeon ; and as he strutted jauntily off with a bilious smirk, he was well-nigh at his wits' end.

When he got home he sent down for Cluffe to the Phoenix, and got him to take Nutter, who was there also, aside and ask him for a little time, or to take part of the rent. But Nutter only said—

“The rent's not mine ; I can't give it or lose it ; and Sturk's not safe. Will you lend it ? I can't.”

This brought Cluffe to reason. He had opened the business, like a jolly companion, in a generous, full-blooded way.

“Well, by Jove ! Nutter, I can't blame you ; for you see, between ourselves, I'm afraid 'tis as you say. We of the Royal Irish have done, under the rose, you know, all we can ; and I'm sorry the poor devil has run himself into a scrape ! but hang it, we must have a conscience ; and if you think there's a risk of losing it, why I don't see that I can press you.”

The reader must not suppose when Cluffe said, “we of the Royal Irish,” in connexion with some pecuniary kindness shown to Sturk, that that sensible Captain had given away any of his money to the surgeon ; but Sturk, in their confidential conference, had hinted something about a “helping hand,” which Cluffe coughed off, and mentioned that Puddock had lent him fifteen pounds the week before.

Sturk stood at his drawing-room window, with his hat on, looking towards the Phoenix, and waiting for Cluffe's return. When he could stand the suspense no longer, he went down and waited at his door-steps. And the longer Cluffe stayed the more did Sturk establish himself in the conviction that the interview had prospered, and that his ambassador was coming to terms with Nutter. He did not know the entire question had been settled in a minute-and-a-half, and that Cluffe was at that moment rattling away at Backgammon with his arch-enemy, Toole, in a corner of the club parlor.

It was not till Cluffe, as he emerged from the Phoenix, saw Sturk's figure stalking in the glimpses of the moon, under the village elm, that he suddenly recollected and marched up to him. Sturk stood, with his face and figure mottled over with the shadow of the moving leaves and the withered ones dropping about him, his hands in his pockets, and a crown-piece—I believe it was his last available coin just then—shut up fast and tight in his cold fingers, with his heart in his mouth, and whistling a little to show his unconcern.

"Well," said Sturk, "he won't, of course?"

Cluffe shook his head.

"Very good—I'll manage it another way," said Sturk, confidently. "Good night;" and Sturk walked off briskly towards the turnpike.

Toole and O'Flaherty were standing in the door-way of the Phoenix, observing the brief and secret meeting under the elm.

"That's Sturk," said Toole.

O'Flaherty grunted acquiescence.

Toole watched attentively till the gentlemen separated, and then g'ancing on O'Flaherty from the corner of his eye, with a knowing smile, "tipped him the wink," as the phrase went in those days.

"An affair of honor!" said O'Flaherty, squaring himself. He smelt powder in everything.

"More like an affair of dishonor," said Toole, buttoning his coat. "He's been 'kiting' all over the town. Nutter can distraint for his rent to-morrow, and Cluffe called him outside the bar to speak with him; put that and that together, sir." And home went Toole.

Sturk, indeed, had no plan, and just then was incapable of forming any. He changed his route, not knowing why, and posted over the bridge, and a good way along the Inchicore road ; and then turned about and strode back again and over the bridge, without stopping, and on towards Dublin ; and suddenly the moon shone out, and he recollected how late it was growing, and so turned about and walked homeward.

As he passed by the row of houses looking across the road towards the river, from Mrs. Irons' hall-door step, a well-known voice accosted him—

" A thweet night, Doctor—the moon tho thilver bright—the air tho thoft ! "

It was little Puddock, whose hand and face were raised toward the sweet regent of the sky.

" Mighty fine night," said Sturk, and he paused for a second. It was Puddock's way to be more than commonly friendly and polite with any man who owed him money ; and Sturk, who thought, perhaps, rightly, that the world of late had been looking cold and black upon him, felt, in a sort of way, thankful for the greeting and its cordial tone.

" A night like this, my dear sir, brings us under the marble balconies of the palace of the Capulets, and sets us repeating ' on such a night sat Dido on the wild seabanks '—you remember—' and with a willow wand, waved her love back to Carthage '—or places us upon the haunted platform, where buried Denmark revisits the glimpses of the moon. My dear Doctor, ' tis wonderful— isn't it—how much of our enjoyment of Nature we owe to Shakspeare—' twould be a changed world with us, Doctor, if Shakspeare had not written— " Then there was a little pause, Sturk standing still.

" God be wi' ye, Lieutenant," said he, suddenly taking his hand. " If there were more men like you there would be fewer broken hearts in the world." And away went Sturk.

---

CHAPTER XLI.

SHOWING HOW CHARLES NUTTER'S BLOW DESCENDED, AND WHAT PART THE SILVER SPECTACLES BORE IN THE CRISIS.

In the morning the distress and keepers were in Sturk's house.

When Sturk heard in the morning that the blow was actually struck, he jumped out of bed, and was taken with a great shivering fit, sitting on the side of it. Little Mrs. Sturk, as white as her night-cap with terror, was yet decisive in emergency, and bethought her of the brandy bottle, two glasses from which the Doctor swallowed before his teeth gave over chattering, and a more natural tint returned to his blue face.

"Oh! Barney, dear, are we ruined?" faltered poor little Mrs. Sturk.

"Ruined, indeed!" cried Sturk, with an oath, "Come in here." He thought his study was on the same floor with his bedroom, as it had been in olden times in their house in Limerick, ten or twelve years before.

"That's the nursery, Barney, dear," she said thinking, in the midst of the horror, like a true mother, of the children's sleep.

Then he remembered, and ran down to the study, and pulled out a sheaf of bills and promissory notes, and renews thereof, making a very respectable show.

"Ruined, indeed!" he cried, hoarsely, talking to his poor little wife in the tones and with the ferocity which the image of Nutter, with which his brain was filled, called up. "Look, I say, here's one fellow owes me that—and that—and that—and there—there's a dozen in that by another—there's two more sets there pinned together—and here's an account of them all—two thousand two hundred—and—you may say, three hundred—two thousand three hundred—owed me here; and that miscreant won't give me a day."

"Is it the rent, Barney?"

"The rent? To be sure; what else should it be?" shouted the Doctor, with a stamp.

And so pale little Mrs. Sturk stole out of the room, as her lord with bitter mutterings pitched his treasure of bad bills back into the escritoire; and she heard him slam the study door and run down stairs to browbeat and curse the men in the hall, for he had lost his head somewhat, between panic and fury. He was in his stockings and slippers, with an old flowered dressing gown, and nothing more but his shirt, and looked, they said, like a madman. One of the fellows was smoking, and Sturk snatched the pipe from his mouth, and stamped it to atoms on the floor, roaring at them to know what the —— brought them there; and without a pause for an answer thundered, "And I suppose you'll not let me take my box of instruments out of the house—mind, it's worth fifty pounds; and curse me, if one of our men dies for want of them in hospital, I'll indict you both, and your employer along with you, for murder!" And so he railed on, till his voice failed him with a sort of choking, and there was a humming in his ears, and a sort of numbness in his head, and he thought he was going to have a fit; and then up the stairs he went again, and into his study, and resolved to have Nutter out—and it flashed upon him that he'd say, "pay the rent first;" and then—what next? why he'd post him all over Dublin, and Chapelizod, and Leixlip, where the Lord Lieutenant and Court were.

While this was going on, little Mrs. Sturk, who on critical occasions took strong resolutions promptly, made a wonderfully rapid toilet, and let herself quietly out of the street door. She had thought of Dr. Walsingham; but Sturk had lately, in one of his imperious freaks of temper, withdrawn his children from the good Doctor's catechetical class, and sent him besides, one of his sturdy, impertinent notes—and the poor little woman concluded there was no chance there.

Well, she took the opposite direction, and turning her back on the town, walked at her quickest pace towards the Brass Castle. The poor little woman had made up her mind to apply to Dangerfield. She had liked his talk at Belmont, where she had met him; and he inquired about the poor, and listened to some of her woful tales with a great deal of sympathy; and she knew he was very rich, and that he appreciated her Barney, and so she trudged on full of hope.

Dangerfield received the lady very affably, in his little parlor, where, having despatched his early meal, he was writing letters. He looked hard at her when she came in, and again when she sat down; and when she had made an end of her long and dismal tale, he opened a sort of strong box, and took out a thin quarto and read, turning the leaves rapidly over.

"Ay, here we have him—Chapelizod—Sturk, Barnabas—Surgeon, R.I.A., assignee of John Lowe—hey! one gale day, as you call it, only!—September. How came that? Rent, £40. Why, then, he owes a whole year's rent, £40, ma'am. September, and his days of grace have expired. He ought to have paid it."

Here there came a dreadful pause, during which nothing was heard but the sharp ticking of his watch on the table.

"Well, ma'am," he said, "when a thing comes before me, I say yes or no promptly. I like your husband, and I'll lend him the amount of his rent."

Poor little Mrs. Sturk jumped up in an ecstasy, and then felt quite sick, and sat down almost fainting, with a death-like smile.

"There's but one condition that I attach, that you tell me truly, my dear madam, whether you came to me directly or indirectly at his suggestion."

No, indeed, she had not; it was all her own thought; she had not dared to mention it to him, lest he should forbid her, and now she should be almost afraid to tell him where she had been.

"He'll not be angry, depend on't, my good madam; you did wisely in coming to me. And should you hereafter stand in need of a friendly office, I beg you'll remember one who is disposed to help you."

Then he sat down and wrote with a flying pen—

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have just learned from Mrs. Sturk that you have an immediate concern for forty pounds, to which, I venture to surmise, will be added some fees, etc. I take leave, therefore, to send herewith fifty guineas, which I trust will suffice for this troublesome affair. We can talk hereafter about repayment. Mrs. Sturk has handed me a memorandum of the advance.

"Your very obedient, humble servant,

"GILES DANGERFIELD.

"The Brass Castle, Chapelizod, 2nd October, 1767."

Then poor little Mrs. Sturk was breaking out into a delirium of gratitude. But he put his hand upon her arm kindly and with a little bow and an emphasis, he said—

"Pray, not a word, my dear madam. Just write a line;" and he slid his desk before her with a sheet of paper on it; "and say Mr. Dangerfield has this day handed me a loan of fifty guineas for my husband, Doctor Barnabas Sturk. Now sign, if you please, and add the date. Very good!"

"I'm afraid you can hardly read it—my fingers tremble a little," said Mrs. Sturk, with a wild little deprecatory titter, and for the first time very near crying.

"'Tis mighty well," said Dangerfield, politely; and he accompanied the lady with the note and fifty guineas, made up in a little rouleau, fast in her hand, across his little garden, and with—"A fine morning truly," and "God bless you, madam," and one of his peculiar smiles, he let her out through his little wicket on the high road. And so away went Mrs. Sturk, scarce feeling the ground under her feet; and Giles Dangerfield carrying his white head very erect, with an approving conscience, and his silver spectacles flashing through the leaves of his lilacs and laburnums, returned to his parlor.

In little more than a quarter of an hour after, Dr. Sturk descended his door-steps in full costume, and marched down the street and passed the artillery barrack, from his violated fortress, as it were, with colors flying, drums beating, and ball in mouth. He paid the money down at Nutter's table, in the small room at the Phoenix, where he sat in the morning to receive his rents, eyeing the agent with a fixed smirk of hate and triumph, and telling down each piece on the table with a fierce clink that had the ring of a curse in it. Little Nutter met his stare of suppressed fury with an eye just as steady and malign, and a countenance blackened by disappointment. Not a word was heard but Sturk's insolent tones counting the gold at every clang on the table.

Nutter shoved him a receipt across the table, and swept the gold into his drawer.

"Go over, Tom," he said to the bailiff, in a stern low tone, "and see the men don't leave the house till the fees are paid."

And Sturk laughed a very pleasant laugh, you may be sure, over his shoulder at Nutter, as he went out at the door.

---

CHAPTER XLII.

RELATING HOW, IN THE WATCHES OF THE NIGHT, A VISION CAME TO STURK, AND HIS EYES WERE OPENED.

STURK's triumph was only momentary. He was in ferocious spirits, indeed, over the breakfast table, and bolted quantities of buttered toast and eggs, all the time gabbling with a truculent volubility, and every now and then a thump, which made poor little Mrs. Sturk start, and whisper, "Oh, my dear!" But after he had done defying the whole world, and showing his wife, and half convincing himself, that he was the cleverest and finest fellow alive, a letter was handed to him, which reminded him, in a dry, short way, of those more formidable and imminent dangers that rose up, apparently insurmountable before him; and he retired to his study to ruminate again, and to write letters and tear them to pieces, and, finally, as was his wont, after hospital hours, to ride into Dublin, to bore his attorney with barren inventions and hopeless schemes of extrication.

Sturk came home that night with a hang-dog and jaded look, and taciturn and half desperate. But he called for whiskey, and drank a glass of that cordial, and brewed a jug of punch in silence, and swallowed glass after glass, and got up a little, and grew courageous and flushed, and prated away, rather loud and thickly with a hiccough now and then and got to sleep earlier than usual.

Somewhere among "the small hours" of the night, he awoke suddenly recollecting something.

"I have it," cried Sturk, with an oath, and an involuntary kick at the foot-board that made his slumbering helpmate bounce.

"What is it, Barney, dear?" squalled she, diving under the bed-clothes, with her heart in her mouth.

"It's like a revelation," cried Sturk, with another oath; and that was all Mrs. Sturk heard of it for some time. But the Surgeon was wide awake, and all alive about it, whatever it was. He sat straight up in bed, with his lips energetically compressed, and his eye-brows screwed together, and his shrewd, hard eyes rolling thoughtfully over the curtains, in the dark, and now and then an ejaculation of wonder, or a short oath, would slowly rise up, and burst from his lips, like a bubble from the fermentation.

Sturk's brain was in a hubbub. He had been dreaming like mad, and his sensorium was still all alive with the images of fifty phantasmagoria, filled up by imagination and conjecture, and a strange, painfully-sharp remembrance of things past—all whirling in a carnival of roystering but dismal riot—masks, dice, laughter, maledictions, drumming, fair ladies, tipsy youths, mountebanks, and assassins; tinkling serenades, the fatal clang and rattle of the dice-box, and long drawn screams.

There was no more use in Sturk's endeavors to reduce all this to order, than reading the Riot Act to a Walpurgis gathering. So he sat muttering unconscious ejaculations, and looking down, as it were, from his balcony, waiting for the uproar to abate; and when the air did clear and cool a little, there was just one face that remained impassive, and serenely wicked before his eyes.

When things arrived at this stage, and he had gathered his recollections about him, and found himself capable of thinking, up he bounced and struck a light, vaulted into his breeches, hauled on his stockings, hustled himself into his roquelaure, and, candle in hand, in slippered feet, glided, like a ghost, down stairs to the back drawing-room, which, as we know, was his study.

The night was serene and breathless. The sky had cleared and the moonlight slept mistily on the soft slopes of the park. The landscape was a febrifuge, and cooled and quieted his brain as he stood before it at his open window, in solitary meditation. It was not till his slowly wandering eye lighted on the church-yard, with a sort of slight shock, that he again bestirred himself.

There it lay, with its white tombstones and its shadows spread under him seeming to say—"Ay, here I am; the narrow goal of all your plans. Not one of the glimmering memorials you see that does not cover what was once a living world of long-headed schemes, chequered remembrances, and well-kept secrets. Dr. Sturk, there are lots of places for you to choose among—suit yourself—here—or here—or maybe here."

And so Sturk closed the window and remembered his dream, and looked out stealthily but sternly from the door, which was ajar, and shut it sharply, and with his hands in his breeches' pockets, took a quick turn to the window; his soul had got into harness again, and he was busy thinking. Then he snuffed the candle, and then quickened his invention by another brisk turn; and then he opened his desk, and sat down to write a note.

"Yes," said he to himself, pausing for a minute, with his pen in his fingers, "'tis as certain as that I sit here."

Well, he wrote the note. There was a kind of smile on his face, which was paler than usual all the while; and he read it over, and threw himself back in his chair, and then read it over again, and did not like it, and tore it up.

Then he thought hard for a while, leaning upon his elbow; and took a couple of great pinches of snuff, and snuffed his candle again, and, as it were, snuffed his wits, and took up his pen with a little flourish, and dashed off another, and read it, and liked it, and gave it a little sidelong nod, as though he said, "You'll do;" and, indeed, considering all the time and thought he spent upon it, the composition was no great wonder, being, after all, no more than this:—

"DEAR SIR,—Will you give me the honor of a meeting at my house this morning, as you pass through the town? I shall remain within till noon; and hope for some minutes' private discourse with you.

"Your most obedient, very humble servant,

"BARNABAS STURK."

Then up stairs went Sturk; and so, with the note, like a loaded pistol, over the chimney, he popped into bed, where he lay awake in agitating rumination, determined to believe that he had seen the last of those awful phantoms—those greasy bailiffs—that smooth, smirking, formidable attorney.

Avaunt! He had found out a charm to rout them all, and they shan't now lay a finger on him—a short and sharp way to clear himself; and so I believe he had.

---

CHAPTER XLIII.

CONCERNING A LITTLE REHEARSAL IN CAPTAIN CLUFER'S LODGING, AND A CERTAIN CONFIDENCE BETWEEN
DR. STURK AND MR. DANGERFIELD.

Mrs. STURK, though very quiet, was an active little body, with a gentle, anxious face. She was up and about very early, and ran down to the King's House, to ask Mrs. Colonel Strafford, who was very kind to her, and a patroness of Sturk's, to execute a little commission for her in Dublin, as she understood she was going into town that day, and the Doctor's horse had gone lame, and was in the hands of the farrier. So the good lady undertook it, and offered a seat in her carriage to Dr. Sturk, should his business call him to town. The carriage would be at the door at half-past eleven.

And as she trotted home—for her Barney's breakfast-hour was drawing nigh—whom should she encounter upon the road, just outside the town, but their grim, spectacled benefactor, Dangerfield, accompanied by, and talking in his usual short way to Nutter, the arch-enemy, who, to say truth, looked confoundedly black; and she heard the silver spectacles say, "'Tis, you understand, my own thoughts only I speak, Mr. Nutter."

The fright and the shock of seeing Nutter so near her, made her salutation a little awkward; and she had, besides, an instinctive consciousness that they were talking about the terrible affair of yesterday. Dangerfield on meeting her, bid Nutter good morning suddenly, and turned about with Mrs. Sturk, who had to slacken her pace a little, for the potent agent chose to walk rather slowly.

"I've been giving Nutter a bit of my mind, madam, about that procedure of his. He's very angry with me, but a great deal more so with your husband, who has my sympathies with him; and I think I'm safe in saying he's likely soon to have an offer of employment under my Lord Castle-mallard, if it suits him."

And he walked on, and talked of other things in short sentences, and parted with Mrs. Sturk with a grim brief kindness at the door, and so walked with his wiry step away towards the Brass Castle, where his breakfast awaited him, and he disappeared round the corner of Martin's-row.

"And which way was he going when you met him and that—that Nutter?" demanded Sturk, who was talking in high excitement, and not being able to find an epithet worthy of Nutter, made it up by his emphasis and his scowl. She told him.

"H'm! then, he can't have got my note yet!"

She looked at him in a way that plainly said, "what note?" but Sturk said no more, and he had trained her to govern her curiosity.

As Dangerfield passed Captain Cluffe's lodgings, he heard the gay tinkling of a guitar, and an amorous duet, not altogether untunefully sung to that accompaniment; and he beheld little Lieutenant Puddock's back, with a broad scarlet and gold ribbon across it, supporting the instrument on which he was industriously thrumming, at the window, while Cluffe, who was giving a high note, with all the tenderness he could throw in his robust countenance, and one of those involuntary grimaces which in amateurs will sometimes accompany a vocal effort, caught the eye of the cynical wayfarer, and stopped short with a disconcerted little cough and a shake of his chops, and a grim, rather red nod, and "Good morning, Mr. Dangerfield." Puddock also saluted, still thrumming a low chord or two as he did so, for he was not ashamed, like his stout playmate, and saw nothing incongruous in their early minstrelsy.

The fact is, these gallant officers were rehearsing a pretty little entertainment they designed for the ladies at Belmont. It was a serenade, in short, and they had been compelled to postpone it in consequence of the broken weather; and though both gentlemen were, of course, romantically devoted to their respective objects, yet there were no two officers in his Majesty's service more bent upon making love with a due regard to health and comfort than our friends Cluffe and Puddock.

"Tinkle, tinkle, twang, twang, THRUM!" went the industrious and accomplished Puddock's guitar; and the voices of the enamored swains kept tolerable tune and time; and Puddock would say, "Don't you think, Captain Cluffe, 'twould perhapth go better if we weren't to try that shake upon A. Do let's try the last two barth without it;" and "I'm thorry to trouble you, but jutht wonth more if you pleathe—

But hard ith the chathe my thad heart mutht purthue, While Daphne, thweet Daphne, thill flieth from my view."

When Dangerfield passed Cluffe's lodging again, returning on his way into Chapelizod, the songsters were at it still. And he smiled his pleasant smile once more, and nodded at poor old Cluffe, who flushed up quite fiercely, and said almost in a mutiny—

"Hang it, Puddock, I believe you keep a fellow singing ballads over the street all day. Didn't you see that cursed fellow Dangerfield, sneering at us—curse him—I suppose he never heard a gentleman sing before; and, by Jove Puddock, you know you do make a fellow go over the same thing so often it's enough to make a dog laugh."

A minute after Dangerfield had mounted Sturk's door steps, and asked to see the Doctor. He was ushered up stairs and into that back drawing-room which we know so well. Sturk rose as he entered.

"Your most obedient, Mr. Dangerfield," said the Doctor with an anxious bow.

"Good morning, sir," said Dangerfield. "I've got your note, and am here in consequence; what can I do?"

Sturk glanced at the door, to see it was shut, and then said—

"Mr. Dangerfield, I've recollected a—something."

"You have? ho! Well, my good sir?"

"You, I know, were acquainted with—with Charles Archer?"

Sturk looked for a moment on the spectacles, and then dropped his eyes.

"Charles Archer," answered Dangerfield, promptly, "yes, to be sure. But, Charles, you know, got into trouble; and 'tis not an acquaintance you or I can boast of; and, in fact, we must not mention him; and I have long ceased to know anything of him."

"But, I've just remembered his address; and there's something about his private history which I very well know, and which gives me a claim upon his kind feeling, and he's now in a position to do me a material service; and there's no man living, Mr. Dangerfield, has so powerful an influence with him as yourself. Will you use it in my behalf, and attach me to you by lasting gratitude?"

Sturk looked straight at Dangerfield; and Dangerfield looked at him, quizzically, in return; after a short pause—

"I will," said Dangerfield, with a sprightly decision. "But, you, know, Charles is not a fellow to be trifled with—hey? and we must not mention his name—you understand—or hint where he lives, or anything about him, in short."

"That's plain," answered Sturk.

"You're going into town, Mrs. Sturk tells me in Mrs. Strafford's carriage. Well, when you return this evening, put down in writing what you think Charles can do for you, and I'll take care he considers it."

"I thank you, sir," said Sturk, solemnly.

"And hark ye, you'd better go about your business in town—do you see—just as usual; 'twill excite inquiry if you don't; so you must in this and other things, proceed exactly as I direct you," said Dangerfield.

"Exactly, sir, depend on't," answered Sturk.

"Good day," said Dangerfield.

"Adieu," said the Doctor; and they shook hands, gravely.

On the lobby Dangerfield encountered Mrs. Sturk, and had a few pleasant words with her, patting the bull-heads of the children, and went down stairs, smiling and nodding ; and Mrs. Sturk popped quietly into the study, and found her husband leaning on the chimney piece, and swabbing his face with his handkerchief—strangely pale—and looking, as the good lady afterwards said, for all the world as if he had seen a ghost.

---

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE CLOSET SCENE, WITH THE PART OF POLONIUS OMITTED.

WHEN Magnolia and the Major had gone out, each on their several devices, poor Mrs. Macnamara called Biddy, their maid, and told her, in a confidential whisper in her ear, though there was nobody by but themselves, and the door was shut.

“ Biddy, now mind the lady that came to me in the end of July—do you remember ?—in the black satin—you know ?—she’ll be here to-day, and we’re going down together in her coach to Mrs. Nutter’s ; but that does not signify. As soon as she comes, bring her here, into this room—d’ye mind ?—and go across that instant minute—d’ye mind now ?—straight to Dr. Toole, and ask him to send me the pepper mint drops he promised me.”

Then she cross-questioned Biddy, to ascertain that she perfectly understood and clearly remembered ; and, finally, she promised her a half-a-crown if she performed this very simple commission to her mistress’s satisfaction, and held her tongue religiously on the subject.

And what could Mary Matchwell want of a conjuring conference, of all persons in the world, with poor little Mrs

Nutter? Mrs. Mack had done in this respect simply as she was bid. She had indeed no difficulty in persuading Mrs. Nutter to grant the interview. Only for Nutter, who set his face against this sort of sham witchcraft, she would certainly have asked him to treat her with a glimpse into futurity at that famous sibyl's house; and now that she had an opportunity of having the enchantress tete-a-tete in her own snug parlor at the Mills, she was in a delightful fuss of mystery and delight.

Mrs. Mack, indeed, from her own sad experience, felt a misgiving and a pang in introducing the formidable prophetess. But what could she do? She dare not refuse; all she could risk was an anxious hint to poor little Mrs. Nutter, "not to be telling her anything, good, bad, or indifferent, but just to ask her what questions she liked, and no more." Indeed, poor Mrs. Mack was low and feverish about this assignation, and would have been more so but for the hope that her Polonius, behind the arras, would bring the woman of Endor to her knees.

All on a sudden, she heard the rumble and jingle of a hackney coach, and the clang of the horses' hoofs pulled up close under her window; her heart bounded and fluttered up to her mouth, and then dropped down like a lump of lead, and she heard a well-known voice talk a few sentences to the coachman, and then in the hall, as she supposed, to Biddy; and so she came into the room, dressed as usual in black, tall, thin, and erect, with a black hood shading her pale face, and the mist and chill of night seemed to enter along with her.

It was a great relief to poor Mrs. Mack, that she actually saw Biddy at that moment run across the street toward Toole's hall-door, and she quickly averted her conscious glance from the light-heeled handmaid.

"Pray take a chair, ma'am," said Mrs. Mack, with a pallid face, and a low courtesy.

Mistress Matchwell made a faint courtesy in return, and, without saying anything, sat down, and peered sharply round the room.

"I'm glad, ma'am, you had no dust to-day; the rain ma'am, laid it beautiful."

Mrs. Mack's ear was strained to catch the sound of Toole's approach, and a pause ensued, during which she got up and poured out a glass of port for the lady, and she presented it to her deferentially. She took it, with a nod, and sipped it, thinking, as it seemed, uneasily. There was plainly something more than usual upon her mind. Mrs. Mack thought—indeed, she was quite sure—she heard a little fussing about the bed-room door, and concluded that the Doctor was getting under cover.

When Mrs. Matchwell had set her empty glass upon the table, she glided to the window, and, Mrs. Mack's guilty conscience smote her, as she saw her look towards Toole's house. It was only, however, for the coach; and having satisfied herself it was at hand, she said—

"We'll have some minutes quite private, if you please—'t isn't my affair, you know, but yours," said the weird woman.

There had been ample time for the arrangement of Toole's ambushade. Now was the moment. The crisis was upon her. But poor Mrs. Mack, just as she was about to say her little say about the front windows, and opposite neighbors, and the privacy of the back bed-room, and to propose their retiring thither, felt a sinking of the heart—a deadly faintness, and an instinctive conviction that she was altogether overmatched, and that she could not hope to play successfully any sort of devil's game with that all-seeing sorceress. She had always thought she was a plucky woman till she met Mistress Mary: Before her her spirit died within her—her blood flowed hurriedly back to her heart, leaving her body cold, pale, and damp, and her soul quailing under the spell of fearful gaze and imperious presence.

She cleared her voice twice, and faltered an inquiry, but broke down in panic; and at that moment Biddy popped in her head—

“The Doctor, ma’am, was sent for to Lucan, an’ he won’t be back, till six o’clock, an’ he left no peppermint drops for you, ma’am, an’ do you want me, if you please, ma’am?”

“Go down, Biddy—that’ll do,” said Mrs. Mack, growing first pale, and then very red.

“What doctor?” said Mrs. Matchwell, turning her large, dismal, wicked gaze full off Mrs. Mack.

“Doctor Toole, ma’am.” She dared not tell a literal lie to that piercing, prominent pair of black eyes.

“And why did you send for Doctor O’Toole, ma’am?”

“I did not send for the Doctor,” answered the fat lady, looking down, for she could not stand that glance that seemed to light up all the caverns of her poor soul, and make her lies stand forth self-confessed. “I did not send for him, ma’am, only for some drops he promised me. I’ve been very sick—I—I—I’m so miserable.”

And poor Mrs. Mack’s nether lip quivered, and she burst into tears.

“You’re enough to provoke a saint, Mrs. Macnamara,” said the woman in black, rather savagely, though coldly enough. “Why you’re on the point of fortune, as it seems to me.” Here poor Mrs. Mack’s inarticulate lamentations waxed more vehement. “You don’t believe it—very well—but where’s the use of crying over your little difficulties, ma’am, like a great baby, instead of exerting yourself and thapking your best friend?”

And the two ladies sat down to a murmuring tete-a-tete at the far end of the room; you could have heard little more than an inarticulate cooing, and poor Mrs. Mack’s sobs, and the stern—

"And is that all? I've had more trouble with you than with fifty reasonable clients—you can hardly be serious—I tell you plainly, you must manage matters better, my good madam; for, frankly, ma'am this won't do."

With which that part of the conference closed, and Mary Matchwell looked out of the window. The coach stood at the door, the horses dozing patiently, and the coachman, with a black eye, mellowing into the yellow stage, and a cut across his nose—both doing well—was marching across from the public-house over the way, wiping his mouth on the cuff of his coat.

"Put on your riding-hood, if you please madam, and come down with me in the coach to introduce me to Mrs. Nutter," said Mrs. Matchwell, at the same time tapping with her long bony fingers to the driver.

"There's no need of that, madam. I said what you desired, and I sent a note to her last night, and she expects you just now; and, indeed, I'd rather not go, madam, if you please."

"'Tis past that now—just do as I tell you, for come you must," answered Mrs. Matchwell.

As the old woman of Berkley obeyed, and got up and went quietly away with her visitor, though her dead flesh quivered with fear, so poor Mrs. Mack, though loath enough, submitted in silence.

---

CHAPTER XLV.

IN WHICH PALE HECATE VISITS THE MILLS, AND CHARLES NUTTER, ESQ., ORDERS TEA.

POOR Mrs. Nutter, I have an honest regard for her memory. If she was scant of brains, she was also devoid of guile—giggles and raspberry jam were the leading traits of her character. Excellent for condoling—better still for rejoicing—she would, on hearing of a surprising good match, or an unexpected son and heir, or a pleasantly-timed legacy, go off like a mild little peal of joy-bells, and keep ringing up and down and zig-zag, and to and again, in all sorts of irregular roulades, without stopping, the whole day long, with "Well, to be sure." "Upon my conscience, now, I scarce can believe it." "An' isn't it pleasant, though." "Oh! the creatures—but it was badly wanted!" "Dear knows—but I'm glad—ha, ha, ha," and so on. A train of reflection and rejoicing not easily exhausted, and readily, by simple transposition, maintainable for an indefinite period. And people, when good news came, used to say, "Sally Nutter will be glad to hear that;" and though she had not a great deal of sense, and her conversation was made up principally of interjections, assisted by little gestures and wonderful expressions of face; and though when analyzed it was not much, yet she made a cheerful noise, and her company was liked.

So they both entered the vehicle, which jingled and rattled so incessantly and so loud that connected talk was quite out of the question, and Mrs. Macnamara was glad 'twas so; and she could not help observing there was something more than the ordinary pale cast of devilment in Mary Matchwell's face.

So they reached Nutter's house, at the mills, a sober, gray-fronted mansion, darkened with tall trees, and in went Mrs. Mack. Little Mrs. Nutter received her in a sort of transport of eagerness, giggle, and curiosity.

"And is she really in the coach now? and, my dear, does she really tell the wonderful things they say? Mrs. Molloy told me—well, now, the most surprising things; and do you actually believe she's a conjuror? But you know Nutter must not know I had her here. He can't abide a fortune-teller. And what shall I ask her? I think about the pearl cross—don't you? for I would like to know, and then whether Nutter or his enemies—you know who I mean—will carry the day—don't you know?"

Poor Mrs. Mack glanced over her shoulder to see she wasn't watched, and whispered her in haste—

"For mercy sake, my dear, take my advice, and that is, listen to all she tells you, but tell her nothing."

And Mary Matchwell, who thought they had been quite long enough together, descended from the carriage, and was in the hall before Mrs. Nutter was aware; and the silent apparition overawed the poor little lady, who faltered a "Good evening, madam—you're very welcome—pray step in." So in they all trooped to Nutter's parlor.

So soon as little Mrs. Nutter got fairly under the chill and shadow of this inauspicious presence, her giggle subsided, and she began to think of the dreadful story she had heard of her having showed Mrs. Flemming, through a glass of fair water, the apparition of her husband, with his face half-masked with blood, the day before his murder by the watchmen in John's-lane. When, therefore, this woman of Endor called for water and glasses, and told Mrs. Mack that she must leave them alone together, poor little empty Mrs. Nutter began to feel very queer, and to wish herself well out of the affair.

"And mayn't Mrs. Mack stay in the room with us?" she asked, following that good lady's retreating figure with an imploring look.

"By no means."

This was addressed sternly to Mrs. Mack herself, who, followed by poor Mrs. Nutter's eyes, moved fatly and meekly out of the room.

She was not without her fair share of curiosity, but on the whole, was relieved and very willing to go. She had only seen Mary Matchwell take from her pocket and uncase a small oval-shaped steel mirror, which seemed to have the property of magnifying objects; for she saw her cadaverous fingers reflected in it to fully double their natural size, and she had half filled a glass with water, and peered through it askew, holding it toward the light.

Well, the door was shut, and an interval of five minutes elapsed; and all of a sudden two horrible screams in quick succession rang through the house.

Betty, the maid, and Mrs. Mack were in the small room on the other side of the hall, and stared in terror on one another. The old lady, holding Betty by the wrist, whispered a benediction; and Betty, crying "Oh! my dear, what's happened the poor mistress?" crossed the hall in a second, followed by Mrs. Mack. And they heard the door unlocked on the inside as they reached it.

In they came, scarce knowing how, and found poor little Mrs. Nutter flat upon the floor, in a swoon, her white face and the front of her dress drenched with water.

"You've a scent bottle, Mrs. Macnamara—let her smell to it," said the grim woman in black, coldly, but with a scarcely perceptible gleam of triumph, as she glanced on the horrified faces of the women.

Well, it was a long fainting fit; but she did come out of it. And when her bewildered gaze at last settled upon Mrs. Matchwell, who was standing darkly and motionless between the windows, she uttered another loud and horrible cry, and clung with her arms round Mrs. Mack's neck, and screamed,

"Oh! Mrs. Mack, there she is—there she is—there she is!"

And she screamed so fearfully, and seemed in such an extremity of terror, that Mary Matchwell, in her sables, glided, with a strange sneer on her pale face, out of the room, across the hall, and into the little parlor, on the other side, like an evil spirit whose mission was half accomplished, and who departed from her for a season.

"She's here, she's here," screamed poor little Mrs. Nutter.

"No, dear, no—she's not—she's gone, my dear—indeed she's gone," replied Mrs. Mack, herself very much appalled.

"Oh! is she gone—is she—is she gone?" cried Mrs. Nutter, staring all round the room, like a child after a frightful dream.

"She's gone, ma'am, dear—she isn't here—by this crass, she's gone!" said Betty, assisting Mrs. Mack, and equally frightened and incensed.

"Oh! oh! Betty, where is he gone? Oh! Mrs. Mack—oh! no—no—never! It can't be—it couldn't. It is not he—he never did it."

"There—there now, Sally, darling—there," said frightened Mrs. Mack, patting her on the back.

"There—there—there—I see him," she cried again. "Oh! Charley, Charley, sure—sure I didn't see it aright—it was not real."

"There now, don't be frettin' yourself, ma'am dear," said Betty.

But Mrs. Mack glanced over her shoulder in the direction in which Mrs. Nutter was looking, and with a sort of shock, not knowing whether it was a bodily presence or a devilish simulacrum raised by the incantations of Mary Matchwell, she beheld the dark features and white eye-balls of Nutter himself looking full on them from the open door.

"Sally—what ails you, sweetheart?" said he, coming close up to her with two swift steps

"Oh! Charley, 'twas a dream—nothing else—a bad dream, Charley. Oh! say it's a dream," cried the poor terrified little woman. "Oh! she's coming! she's coming!" she cried again, with an appalling scream.

"Who—what's the matter?" cried Nutter, looking in the direction of his poor wife's gaze in black wrath and bewilderment, and beholding the wierd woman who had followed him into the room. As he gazed on that pale, wicked face, and sable shape, the same sort of spell which she exercised upon Mrs. Mack and poor Mrs. Nutter, seemed in a few seconds to steal over Nutter himself, and fix him in the place where he stood. His mahogany face bleached to sickly boxwood, and his eyes looked like pale balls of stone about to leap from their sockets.

After a few seconds, however, with a sort of a gasp, like a man awaking from a frightful sleep, he said,

"Betty, take the mistress to her home;" and to his wife, "go, sweetheart. Mrs. Macnamara, this must be explained," he added; and taking her by the hand, he led her in silence to the hall-door, and signed to the driver.

"Oh! thank you, Mr. Nutter," she stammered; "but the coach is not mine; it came with that lady who's with Mrs. Nutter."

He had up to this moved with her like a somnambulist.

"Ay, that lady—and who the devil is she?" and he seized her arm with a sudden grasp that made her wince.

"Oh! that lady!" faltered Mrs. Mack, "she's—I believe she's Mrs. Matchwell—the—the lady that advertises her abilities."

"Hèy! I know—the fortune-teller and go-between—her!"

She was glad he asked her no more questions, but let her go, and stood in a livid meditation, forgetting to bid her good evening. She did not wait, however, for his courteous dismissal, but hurried away toward Chapelizod.

When Nutter returned to the parlor his wife had not yet left it.

"I'll attend here, go you upstairs," said Nutter. He spoke strangely, and looked odd, and altogether seemed strung up to a high pitch.

Out went Betty, seeing it was no good dawdling, for her master was resolute and formidable. The room, like others in old-fashioned houses with thick walls, had a double door. He shut the one with a stern slam, and then the other; and though the honest maid loitered in the hall, and, indeed, placed her ear very near the door, she was not much the wiser.

There was some imperfectly heard talk in the parlor, and cries, and sobs, and more talking. Then, before Betty was aware, the door suddenly opened, and out came Mary Matchwell, with gleaming eyes, and a pale laugh of spite and victory, and threw a look, as she passed, upon the maid that frightened her, and so vanished into her coach.

Nutter disengaged himself from poor Mrs. Nutter's arms, in which he was nearly throttled, while she shrieked,

"Oh! Charley, dear—dearest Charley—Charley, darling, isn't it frightful?" and so on.

"Betty, take care of her," was all he said, and that sternly, like a man quietly desperate, but with a dismal fury in his face.

He went into a little room on the other side of the now darkening hall, and shut the door, and locked it inside. It was partly because he did not choose to talk just now any more with his blubbering and shrieking wife. He was a very kind husband, in his way, but a most incapable nurse, especially in a case of hysterics.

He came out with a desk in his hands.

"Moggy," he said, in a low tone, seeing his other servant woman in the dusk crossing at the foot of the stairs, "here, take this desk, leave it in our bedroom—'tis for the mistress; tell her so by-and-bye."

The wench carried it up; but poor Mrs. Nutter was in no condition to comprehend anything, and was talking quite wildly, and seemed to be growing worse rather than better.

Nutter stood alone in the hall, with his back to the door from which he had just emerged, his hands in his pockets, and the same dreary and wicked shadow over his face.

"So that—Sturk will carry his point after all," he muttered.

On the hall wainscot just opposite hung his horse-pistols; and when he saw them, he growled in the same tone—

"I wish one of those bullets was through my head, so t'other was through his."

And he cursed him with laconic intensity. Then Nutter slapped his pockets, like a man feeling if his keys and other portable chattels are all right before he leaves his home. But his countenance was that of one whose mind is absent and wandering. And he looked down on the ground, as it seemed in profound and troubled abstraction; and, after a while, he looked up again, and again glared fiercely on the cold pistols that hung before him. And he took down one with a snatch and weighed it in his hand, and fell to thinking again; and, as he did, kept opening and shutting the pan with a snap, and so for a long time, and thinking deeply to the tune of that castanet, and at last he roused himself, who knows from what dreams, and hung up the weapon again by its fellow, and looked about him.

The hall-door lay open, as Mary Matchwell had left it, Nutter stood on the door-steps, where he could hear faintly, from above stairs, the cries and wails of poor, hysterical Mrs. Nutter. He remained there a good while, during which, unperceived by him, Dr. Toole's pestle-and-mortar-boy, who had entered by the back-way, had taken a seat in the hall. He was waiting for an empty draught-bottle, in exchange for a replenished flask of the same agreeable beverage, which he had just delivered; for physic was one of poor Mrs. Nutter's weaknesses, though, happily, she did not swallow half what came home for her. .

When Nutter turned round, the boy—a sharp, tattling vagabond—he knew him well, was reading a printed card he had picked up from the floor, with the impress of Nutter's hob-nailed tread upon it. It was endorsed upon the back, "For Mrs. Macnamara, with the humble duty of her obedient servant, M. M."

"What's that, sirrah?" shouted Nutter.

"For Mrs. Nutter, I think, sir," said the urchin, jumping up with a start.

"Mrs. Nutter?" repeated he—"No—Mrs. Mac—Macnamara," and he thrust it into his surtout pocket. "And what brings you here sirrah?" he added savagely; for he thought everybody was spying after him now, and, as I said, he knew him for a tattling young dog.

"Here, woman," he cried to Moggy, who was passing again, "give that pimping rascal his — answer; and see, sirrah, if I find you sneaking about the place again, I'll lay that whip across your back."

Nutter went into the small room again.

"An' how are ye, Jemmie—how's every inch iv you?" inquired Moggy of the boy, when his agitation was a little blown over.

"I'm elegant, thank ye," he answered; "an' what's the matter wid ye all. I cum through the kitchen, and seen no one."

"Och? didn't you hear? The poor mistress—she's as bad as bad can be." And then began a whispered confidence, broken short by Nutter's again emerging, with the leather belt he wore at night on, and a short back-sword, called a couteau de chasse, therein, and a heavy walking-cane in his hand.

"Get tea for me, wench, in half an hour," said he, this time quite quietly, though still sternly, and without seeming to observe the quaking boy, who, at first sight, referred these martial preparations to a resolution to do execution upon him forthwith; "you'll find me in the garden when it's ready."

And he strode out, and pushing over the wicket door in the thick garden hedge, and, with his cane shouldered, walked with a quick, resolute step down towards the pretty walk by the river, with the thick privet hedge and the row of old pear trees by it. And that was the last that was heard or seen of Mr. Nutter for some time.

---

CHAPTER XLVI

SWANS ON THE WATER.

At about half-past six that evening, Puddock arrived at Captain Cluffe's lodgings, and for the last time the minstrels rehearsed their lovelorn and passionate ditties. They were drest "all in their best," under the outer covering, which partly for mystery, and partly for bodily comfort—the wind, after the heavy rains of the last week, having come round to the east—these prudent troubadours wore.

The sly fellows agreed that they must not go to Belmont by Chapelized-bridge, which would lead them through the town, in front of the barrack, and under the very sign-board of the Phoenix. No, they would go by the Knockmaroon-road, across the river by the ferry, and unperceived and unsuspected, enter the grounds of Belmont on the further side.

So away went the amorous musicians, favored by the darkness, and talking in an undertone, and thinking more than they talked, while little Puddock, from under his cloak, scratched a faint little arpeggio and a chord, ever and anon, upon "the inthtrument."

When they reached the ferry, the boat was tied at the near side, but deuce a ferryman could they see. So they began to shout and hallo, singly, and together, until Cluffe, in much ire and disgust, exclaimed—

"Curse the sot—drunk in some whiskey-shop—the black-guard! That is the way such scoundrels throw away their chances, and help to fill the high roads with beggars and thieves; curse him, I shan't have a note left if we go on bawling this way. I suppose we must go home again."

"Fiddle-thick!" exclaimed the magnanimous Puddock. "I pulled myself acroth little more than a year ago, and 'twath ath eathy ath—ath—any thing. Get in, an looth the rope when I tell you."

This boat was managed by means of a rope stretched across the stream from bank to bank; seizing which, in both hands, the boatman, as he stood in his skiff, hauled it, as it seemed, with very moderate exertion across the river.

Cluffe chuckled as he thought how sold the rascally boatman would be, on returning, to find his bark gone over the other side.

"Don't be uneathy about the poor fellow," said Puddock; "we'll come down in the morning and make him a present; and explain how it occurred."

"Explain yourself—poor fellow be hanged!" muttered Cluffe, as he took his seat, for he did not part with his silver lightly. "I say, Puddock, tell me when I'm to slip the rope."

The signal given, Cluffe let go; while the plump little Lieutenant, standing upright, midships in the boat, hauled away, though not quite so deftly as was desirable. Some two or three minutes had passed before they reached the middle of the stream, which was, as Puddock afterwards remarked, "gigantically thwollen;" and at this point they came to something very like a standstill.

"I say, Puddock, keep her head a little more up the stream, will you?" said Cluffe, thinking no evil, and only to show his nautical knowledge.

"It's easy to say keep her head up the stream," gasped Puddock, who was now laboring fearfully, and quite crimson in the face, and too much out of breath to say more.

The shades of night and the roar of the waters prevented Cluffe's observing these omens aright.

"What the plague are you doing now?" cried Cluffe, for the first time seriously uncomfortable, as the boat slowly spun round, bringing her head toward the bank they had quitted.

"Curse you, Puddock, why—what are you going back for; you can't do it."

"Lend a hand," bawled Puddock, in extremity. "I say, help, seize the rope; I say, Cluffe, quick thir, my arms are breaking."

There was no great exaggeration in this—there seldom was in any thing Puddock said; and the turn of the boat had twisted his arms like the strand of a rope.

"Hold on, Puddock, curse you, I'm coming," roared Cluffe, quite alive to the situation. "If you let go, I'm diddled but I'll shoot you."

"Catch the rope, I thay, thir, or 'tith all over!"

Cluffe made a vehement exertion to catch the rope, but it was out of reach, and the boat rocked so suddenly from his rising, and he sat down by mistake again, with a violent plump that made his teeth gnash, in his own place ; and the shock and his alarm stimulated his anger.

" Hold on, sir ; hold on, you little devil, I say, one minute, here—hold—hollo !"

While Cluffe was shouting these words, and scrambling forward, Puddock was crying,

" Curth it, Cluffe, quick—oh ! hang it, I can't thtand it—bleth my thoul !"

And Puddock let go, and the boat and its precious freightage, with a horrid whisk and a sweep, commenced its seaward career in the dark.

" Take the oars, sir, hang you !" cried Cluffe.

" There are no oarth," replied Puddock, solemnly.

" Or the helm."

" There'th no helm."

" And what the devil, sir ?" and a splash of cold water soused the silken calves of Cluffe at this moment. " Heugh ! eugh !—and what the devil will you do, sir ? you don't want to drown me, I suppose " roared he, holding hard by the gunwale.

" You can thwim, Cluffe ; jump in, and don't mind me," said little Puddock, sublimely.

Cluffe, who was a bit of a boaster, had bragged one evening at mess of his swimming, which he said was famous in his school days ; 'twas a lie, but Puddock believed it implicitly.

" Thank you !" roared Cluffe. " Swim, indeed !—but-toned up this way—and—and the gout too."

" I say, Cluffe, save the guitar, if you can," said Puddock.

" Guitar be diddled !" cried he ; " 'tis gone—where we're going—to the bottom. What devil possessed you, sir, to drown us this way ?"

Puddock sighed. They were passing at this moment the quiet banks of the pleasant meadow of Belmont, and the lights twinkled from the bow-window in the drawing-room. I don't know whether Puddock saw them—Cluffe certainly did not.

"Hollo ! hollo !—a rope !" cried Cluffe, who had hit upon this desperate expedient for raising the neighborhood. "A rope—a rope—hollo ! hollo !—a ro-o-o-pe !"

And Aunt Becky, who heard the wild whooping, mistook it for drunken fellows at their diversions, and delivered their sentiments in the drawing-room accordingly.

---

CHAPTER XLVII.

SWANS IN THE WATER.

"WE'RE coming to something—what's that?" said Puddock, as a long row of black stakes presented themselves at some distance ahead, in the dusky moonlight, slanting across the stream.

"'Tis the salmon-weir !" roared Cluffe, with an oath that subsided into something like a sickening prayer.

It was only a fortnight before that a tipsy fellow had been found drowned in the net. Cluffe had lost his head much more than Puddock, though Cluffe had fought duels. But then, he really could not swim a bit, and he was so confidently buckled up.

"Sit to the right. Trim the boat, sir !" said little Puddock.

"Trim the devil !" bawled Cluffe, to whom this order of Puddock's, it must be owned a useless piece of martinetism in their situation, was specially disgusting ; and he added, looking furiously ahead—" 'Tisn't the boat I'd trim, I promise you : you—you ridiculous murderer !"

Just then Puddock's end of the boat touched a stone, or a post, or something in the current, and that in which Cluffe sat came wheeling swiftly round across the stream, and brought the gallant Captain so near the bank that, with a sudden jerk, he caught the end of a branch that stretched far over the water, and, spite of the confounded tightness of his toilet, with the energy of sheer terror, climbed a good way ; but, reaching a point where the branch forked, he could get no further, though he tugged like a brick. But what was a fat fellow of fifty, laced, and buckled, and buttoned up, like poor Cluffe—with his legs higher up among the foliage than his head and body—to do, and with his right calf caught in the fork of a branch, so as to arrest all progress, and especially as the Captain was plainly too much for the branch, which was drooping toward the water, and emitting sounds premonitory of a smash.

With a long, screaming crash the branch stooped down to the water, and, so soon as the cold element made itself acquainted with those parts that reached it first, the gallant Captain, with a sort of sob, redoubled his efforts, and down came the faithless bough more and more perpendicularly until his nicely got-up cue and bag, then his powdered head, and finally Captain Cluffe's handsome features, went under the surface. When this occurred he instantaneously disengaged his legs with a vague feeling that his last struggle above water was over.

His feet immediately touched the bottom ; he stood erect, little above his middle, and quite out of the main current, within two or three steps of the bank, and he found himself—he scarcely knew how—on terra firma, impounded in a little flower-garden, with lilacs, and laburnums, and sweetbrims, and, through a window close at hand, whom should he see but Dangerfield, who was drying his hands in a towel; and, as Cluffe stood for a moment, letting the water pour down through his sieves, he further saw him make some queer little arrangements, and eventually pour out and swallow a glass of brandy, and was tempted to invoke his aid on the spot; but some small incivilities which he had bestowed upon Dangerfield, when he thought he cherished designs upon Aunt Rebecca, forbade; and at that moment he spied the little wicket that opened upon the road, and Dangerfield stepped close up to the window, and cried sternly—"Who's there?" with his grim spectacles close to the window.

The boyish instinct of "hide and seek" took possession of Cluffe, and he glided forth from the precincts of the Brass Castle upon the high road, just as the little hall door was pushed open, and he heard the harsh tones of Dangerfield challenging the gooseberry bushes and hollyhocks, and thrashing the evergreens with his cane.

Cluffe hied straight to his lodging, and ordered a sack posset. Worthy Mrs. Mason eyed him in silent consternation, drenched and dishevelled, wild, and discharging water from every part of his clothing and decorations, as he presented himself without a hat, before her dim dipt candle in the hall.

"I'll take that—that vessel, if you please, sir, that's hanging about your neck," said the mild and affrighted lady, meaning Puddock's guitar, through the circular orifice of which, under the chords, the water with which it was filled occasionally splashed.

"Oh—ch?—the instrument?—confound it!" and rather sheepishly he got the gay red and gold ribbon over his lank head, and placing it in her hand without explanation, he said—"A warming-pan as quickly as may be, I beg, Mrs. Mason—and the posset, I do earnestly request. You see—

I—I've been nearly drowned—and—and I can't answer for consequences if there be one minute's delay."

And up he went streaming, with Mrs. Mason's candle, to his bed-room, and dragged off his clinging garments, and dried his fat body like a man coming out of a bath, and roared for hot water for his feet, and bellowed for the posset and warming-pan, and rolled into his bed, and kept the whole house in motion.

And so soon as he had swallowed his cordial, and toasted his sheets, and with the aid of his man rolled himself in a great blanket, and clapped his feet in a tub of hot water, and tumbled back again into his bed, he bethought him of Puddock, and ordered his man to take his compliments to Captain Burgh and Lieutenant Lillyman, the tenants of the nearest lodging-house, and to request either to come to him forthwith on a matter of life or death.

Lillyman was at home, and came.

"Puddock's drowned, my dear Lillyman, and I'm little better. The ferry boat broke away with us. Do go down to the Adjutant—they ought to raise the salmon nets—I'm very ill myself—very ill, indeed—else I'd have assisted; but you know me, Lillyman. Poor Puddock—'tis a sad business—but lose no time."

---

CHAPTER XLVIII.

TREATING OF SOME CONFUSION, IN CONSEQUENCE, IN THE CLUB-ROOM OF THE PHOENIX AND ELSEWHERE, AND OF A HAT THAT WAS PICKED UP.

WHEN Cluffe sprang out of the boat, he was very near capsizing it and finishing Puddock off-hand, but she righted and shot away swiftly towards the very centre of the weir, over which she swept, and continued her route toward Dublin—bottom upward—leaving little Puddock, clinging to a post, at top, and standing upon a rough sort of plank, which afforded a very unpleasant footing, by which the nets were visited from time to time.

"Hollo! are you safe, Cluffe?" cried the little Lieutenant, quite firm, though a little dizzy, on his narrow stand, with the sheets of foam whizzing under his feet; what had become of his musical companion he had not the faintest notion, and when he saw the boat drive along the stream upside down, he nearly despaired.

But when the Captain's military cloak, which he took for Cluffe himself, followed in the track of the boat, whisking, sprawling, and tumbling, in what Puddock supposed to be the agonies of drowning, and went over the weir and disappeared from view, he quite gave the Captain over.

"Surrendhur, you thievin' villian, or I'll put the contints iv this gun into yir carcass," shouted an awful voice from the right bank, and Puddock saw the outline of a gigantic marksman, preparing to fire into his corresponding flank.

"What do you mean, sir?" shouted Puddock, in extreme wrath and discomfort.

"Robbin' the nets, you spalpeen; if you throw them salmon your hidin' undher your coat into the wather, be the tare-o'-war"——

"What thalmon, thir?" interrupted the Lieutenant.

"Why, salmon's not in season, sir."

"None iv yer flummery, you schamin' scoundhrel; but jest come here and give yourself up, for so sare as you don't, or daar to stir an inch from that spot, I'll blow you to smithereens."

"Captain Cluffe is drowned, sir; and I'm Lieutenant Puddock," rejoined the officer.

"Tare-an-ouns, an' is it yerself, Captain Puddock, that's in it?" cried the man. "I ax yer pardon; but I tuk you for one of thim vagabonds that's always plundherin' the fish. And who in the wide world, Captain jewel, id expeck to see you there, mediatin' in the middle of the river, this time o' night; an' I dunna how in the world you got there, at all, at all, for the planking is carried away behind you since yistherday."

"Give an alarm, if you please, sir, this moment," urged Puddock. "Captain Cluffe has gone over this horrid weir not a minute sinthe, and is I fear drowned."

"Dhrownded! och! bloody wars."

"Yes, sir, send some one this moment down the stream with a rope's end"—

"Hollo, Jemmy?" cried the man, and whistled through his crooked finger.

"Jemmy," said he to the boy who presented himself, "run down to Tom Garret, at the Mill-bridge, and tell him Captain Cluffe's dhrownded over the weir, and to take the boat-hook and rope—he's past the bridge by this time—ay is he at the King's House—an' if he brings home the corpse alive or dead, before an hour, Captain Puddock here will give him twenty guineas reward." So away went the boy.

"'Tis an unaisy way you're situated yourself, I'm afeard," observed the man.

"Have the goodness to say, sir, by what meanth if any, I can reach either bank of the river," lisped Puddock, with dignity.

"'Tis thrue for you, Captain, that's the chat—Can you swim?"

"No, thir."

"An' how the dickens did you get there?"

"I'd rather hear, sir, how I'm to get away, if you pleathe," replied Puddock, loftily.

"Are you bare-legged?" shouted the man.

"No, thir," answered the little officer, rather shocked.

"An' you're there wid shoes on your feet?"

"Of course, sir," answered Puddock.

"Chuck them into the water this instant minute," roared the man.

"Why, there are valuable buckles, sir," remonstrated Puddock.

"Do you mane to say you'd rather be dhrowneded in yer buckles than alive in yer stockin' feet?" he replied.

There were some cross expostulations, but eventually the fellow came out to Puddock. Perhaps the feat was not quite so perilous as he represented; but it certainly was not a pleasant one. Puddock had a rude and crazy sort of banister to cling to, and rugged and slippery footing; but slowly and painfully, from one post to another, he made his way, and at last jumped on the solid, though not dry land, his life and his buckles safe.

"I'll give you a guinea in the morning, if you come to my quarterth, Mr. — thir," and, without wating a second, away he ran by the footpath, and across the bridge, right into the Phoenix, and burst into the club-room. There were assembled old Arthur Slowe, Tom Trimmer, from Lucan, old Trumble, Jack Collop, Colonel Stafford, and half-a-dozen more members, including some of the officers—O'Flaherty among the number, a little "flashy with liquor," as the phrase then was.

Puddock stood in the wide opened door, with the handle in his hand. He was dishevelled, soused with water, bespattered with mud, his round face very pale, and he fixed a wild stare on the company. The clatter of old Trimmer's backgammon, Slowe's disputations over the draft-board with Colonel Strafford, Collop's dissertation on the points of that screw of a horse he wanted to sell, and the general buzz of talk, were all almost instantaneously suspended on the appearance of this phantom, and Puddock exclaimed,

"Gentlemen, I'm thorry to tell you, Captain Cluffe ith, I fear, drowned."

"Cluffe?" "Drowned?" "By Jupiter!" "You don't say so?" and a round of such ejaculations followed this announcement.

"He went over the salmon weir—I saw him—Coyle's weir—headlong, poor fellow! I shouted after him, but he could not anthwer, so pray let's be off, and——"

Here he recognised the Colonel with a low bow, and paused. The commanding officer instantaneously dispatched Lieutenant Brady, who was there, to order out Sergeant Blakeney and his guard, and any six good swimmers in the regiment who might volunteer, with a reward of twenty guineas for whoever should bring in Cluffe alive, or ten guineas for his body.

By this time Lillyman was running like mad from Cluffe's lodging along Martin's-row to the rescue of Puddock, who, at that moment with his friends and the aid of a long pole, was poking into a little floating tanglement of withered leaves, turf, and rubbish, under the near arch of the bridge, in the belief that he was dealing with the mortal remains of Cluffe.

Lillyman overtook Toole at the corner of the street just in time to hear the scamper of the men, at double-quick, running down the sweep of the road to the bridge, and to hear the shouting that arose from the parade ground by the river bank, from the men within the barrack precincts.

Toole joined Lillyman running.

"What the plague's this hubbub and hullo?" he cried.

"Puddock's drowned," panted Lillyman.

"Puddock! bless us, where?" puffed Toole.

"Hullo! you, sir—have they heard it—is he drowned?" cried Lillyman to the sentry outside the gate.

"Dhrowned? yes, sir," replied the man saluting.

"Is help gone?"

"Yes, sir, Lieutenant Brady, and Sergeant Blakeney, and nine men."

"Come along," cried Lillyman to Toole, and they started afresh. They heard the shouting by the river bank, and followed it by the path round the King's House, passing the Phoenix; and old Colonel Strafford, who was gouty, and no runner, standing with a stern and anxious visage at the door, along with old Trumble, Slowe, and Trimmer, and some of the maids and drawers in the rear, all in consternation.

"Bring me the news," screamed the Colonel, as they passed.

Lillyman was the better runner. Toole, a good deal blown, but full of pluck, was laboring in the rear; Lillyman jumped over the stile, at the river path; and Toole saw an officer who resembled "poor Puddock," he thought, a good deal, cross the road, and follow in Lillyman's wake. The Doctor crossed the stile next, and made his best gallop in rear of the plump officer, excited by the distant shouting, and full of horrible curiosity and good nature.

Nearly opposite Inchicore they fished up an immense dead pig; and Toole said, to his amazement, he found Puddock crying over it, and calling it "my brother!" And this little scene added another very popular novelty to the Doctor's stock of convivial monologues.

Toole, who loved Puddock, hugged him heartily, and when he could get breath, shouted triumphantly after the more advanced party, "He's found! he's found!"

"Oh, thank Heaven!" cries little Puddock, with upturned eyes; "but is he really found?"

The Doctor almost thought that his perils had affected his intellect.

"Is he found—are you found?" cried the Doctor, resuming that great shake by both hands, which, in his momentary puzzle he had suspended.

"I—a—oh, dear! I don't quite understand. Is he lost? for mercy's sake is Cluffe lost?" implored Puddock.

"Lost in his bedclothes, maybe," cried Lillyman, who had joined them.

"But he's not—he's not drowned?"

"Hang it! he's in bed, in his lodging, drinking hot punch, this half hour."

"But are you certain?"

"Why, I saw him there myself," answered Lillyman, with an oath.

Poor little Puddock actually clasped his hands, looked up, and poured forth a hearty, almost hysterical, thanksgiving; for he had charged Cluffe's death altogether upon his own soul, and his relief was beyond expression.

In the meantime, the old gentlemen of the club were in a thrilling suspense, and that not altogether disagreeable state of horror in which men chew the cud of bitter fancy over other men's catastrophes. After about ten minutes in comes young Spaight.

"Well," says the Colonel, "is Cluffe safe, or—eh?"

"Cluffe's safe—only half drowned; but poor Puddock's lost."

"What!"

"Drowned, I'm afraid."

"Drowned! who says so?" repeats the Colonel.

"Cluffe—everybody."

"Why, there it is," replied the Colonel with a great oath, breaking through all his customary reserve and stiffness, and flinging his cocked hat on the middle of the table, piteously, "A fellow that can't swim a yard will go by way of saving a great—a large gentleman, like Captain Cluffe, from drowning, and he's pulled in himself; and so—bless my soul! what's to be done?"

So the Colonel broke into a lamentation, and a fury, and a wonder. "Cluffe and Puddock, the two steadiest officers in the corps! He had a devilish good mind to put Cluffe under arrest—the idiots—Puddock—he was devilish sorry. There wasn't a more honorable"—et cetera. In fact, a very angry and pathetic funeral oration, during which, accompanied by Doctor Toole, Lieutenant Puddock, in person, entered; and the Colonel stopped short with his eyes and mouth very wide open, and said the Colonel very sternly.

"I—I'm glad to see, sir, you're safe; and—and—I suppose, I shall hear now that Cluffe's drowned?" and he stamped the emphasis on the floor.

While all this was going on, some of the soldiers had actually got into Dublin. The tide was in, and the water very high at "Bloody Ridge." A hat, near the corner, was whisking round and round, always trying to get under the arch, and always, when on the point, twirled round again into the corner. A watchman's crozier hooks the giddy thing. It is not a military hat; but they bring it back, and the captive lies in the guard-room—mentioned by me because we've seen that identical hat before

---

CHAPTER XLIX.

HOW CHARLES NUTTER'S TEA, PIPE, AND TOBACCO-BOX
WERE ALL SET OUT FOR HIM IN THE SMALL PARLOR
AT THE MILLS; AND HOW THAT NIGHT WAS PASSED IN THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD.

Mrs. NUTTER and Mrs. Sturk, were this night stricken with a common fear and sorrow.

Darkness descended on the Mills and the river—a darkness deepened by the umbrageous trees that grouped about the old gray house in which poor Mrs. Nutter lay so ill at ease.

Moggy carried the jingling tray of tea-things into Nutter's little study, and lighted his candles, and set the silver snuffers in the dish, and thought she heard him coming, and ran back again, and returned with the singing "tea-kitchen," and then away again, for the thin buttered toast under its china cover, which our ancestors loved.

Then she listened—but 'twas a mistake—it was the Widow Macan's step, who carried the ten pail-fuls of water up from the river to fill the butt in the backyard every Tuesday and Friday.

Then Moggy lighted the fire with the stump of a candle and she set the small round table beside it, and laid her master's pipe and tobacco-box on it, and listened, and began to wonder what detained him.

So she went out into the sharp still air, and stood on the hall-door step, and listened again. Presently she heard the Widow Macan walking up from the garden with her last pail on her head, who stopped when she saw her, and set down the vessel upon the corner of the clumsy little balustrade by the door-step. So Moggy declared her uneasiness, which waxed greater when Mrs. Macan told her that "the mather, God bless him, wasn't in the garden."

She had seen him standing at the river's edge, while she passed and repassed. He did not move a finger, or seem to notice her, and was looking down into the water. When she came back the third or fourth time, he was gone.

At Moggy's command she went back into the garden, though she assured her solemnly—" 'twas nansinse lookin' there"—and called Mr. Nutter, till she was certain that he was neither in the garden nor orchard, nor anywhere near the house. And when she stopped, the silence seemed awful, and the darkness under the trees closed round her with a supernatural darkness, and the river at the foot of the walk seemed snorting some inarticulate story of horror.

So she locked the garden door quickly, and ran faster than she often did along the sombre walk up to the hall-door, and told her tale to Moggy, and begged to carry the pail in by the hall-door.

In they came, and Moggy shut the hall-door, and turned the key in it. Perhaps 'twas the state in which the poor lady lay up stairs that helped to make them excited and frightened. Betty was sitting by her bedside, and Toole had been there, and given her some opiate, I suppose, for she had dropped into a flushed snoring sleep, a horrid counterfeit of repose. But she had first had two or three frightful fits, and all sorts of wild, screaming talk between. Perhaps it was the apparition of Mary Matchwell whose evil influence was so horribly attested by the dismal spectacle she had left behind her that predisposed them to panic; but assuredly each anticipated no good from the master's absence, and had a foreboding of something bad, of which they did not speak; but only disclosed by looks, and listening, and long silences. The lights burning in Nutter's study invited them, and there the ladies seated themselves, and made their tea in the kitchen tea-pot, and clapt it on the hob, and listened for sounds from Mrs. Nutter's chamber, and for the step of her husband crossing the little church-yard; and they grew only more nervous from listening.

Then, on a sudden, there came a great yell from poor Mrs. Nutter's chamber, and they both stood up very pale. The Widow Macan, with the cup in her hand that she was "tossing" at the moment, and Moggy, all aghast, invoked a blessing under her breath, and they heard loud cries and sudden volleys of talk, and Biddy's voice, soothing the patient.

Poor Mrs. Nutter had started up, all on a sudden, from her narcotic doze with a hideous scream that had frightened the woman down stairs. Then she cried—

"Where am I?" and "Oh, the witch—the witch!"

"Oh! no, ma'am, dear," replied Betty; "now, aisy, ma'am, darling."

"I'm going mad."

"No, ma'am, dear!—there now—sure 'tis poor Betty that's in it—don't be afeard, ma'am.

Then, in the midst of Betty's consolations, she broke into a flood of tears, and seemed in some sort relieved; and Betty gave her drops again, and she began to mumble to herself, and so to doze.

At the end of another ten minutes, with a scream, she started up again.

"That's her step—where are you, Betty?" she shrieked; and when Betty ran to the bedside, she held her so hard that the maid was ready to cry out, leering all the time over her shoulder—"Where's Charles Nutter?—I saw him speaking to you."

Then the poor little woman grew quieter, and by her looks and moans, and the clasping of her hands, and her up-turned eyes, seemed to be praying; and when Betty stealthily opened the press to take out another candle, her poor Mistress uttered another terrible scream, crying—

"You wretch! her head won't fit—you can't hide her;" and the poor woman jumped out of her bed, shrieking "Charles, Charles, Charles!"

Betty grew so nervous and frightened, that she fairly bawled to her colleague, Moggy, and told her she would not stay in the room unless she sat up all night with her. So together they kept watch and ward, and as the night wore on Mrs. Nutter's slumbers grew more natural and less brief, and her paroxysms of waking terror less maniacal. And thus this heavy night wore over; and the wind, which began to rise as the hours passed, made sounds full of sad untranslatable meaning in the ears of the watchers.

Poor Mrs. Sturk meanwhile, in the House by the Churchyard, sat listening and wondering, and plying her knitting-needles in the drawing-room. When the hour of her Barney's expected return had passed some time, she sent down to the barrack, and then to the Club, and then on to the King's House, with her service to Mrs. Strafford to inquire after her spouse. But her first and second round of inquiries despatched at the latest minute at which she was likely to find any body out of bed to answer them, were altogether fruitless. And the lights went out in one house after another, and the Phoenix shut its doors, and her own servants were for hours gone to bed ; and the little town of Chapelizod was buried in the silence of universal slumber. And poor Mrs. Sturk still sat in her drawing-room, more and more agitated and frightened.

Poor Mrs. Sturk ! She raised the window a few inches, that she might the better hear the first distant ring of his coming on the road. She foregot he had not his horse that night, and was but a pedestrian. But somehow the night-breeze through the aperture made a wolfish howling and sobbing, that sounded faint and far away, and had a hateful character of mingled despair and banter in it.

She said every now and then aloud, to reassure herself—“ what a noise the wind makes, to be sure ! ” and after a while she opened the window wider. But her candle flared, and the flame tossed wildly about, and the perplexed lady feared it might go out absolutely. So she shut down the window altogether ; for she could not bear the ill-omened baying any longer.

So it grew to be past two o'clock, and she was afraid that Barney would be very angry with her for sitting up, should he return.

She went to bed, therefore, where she lay only more feverish—listening, and conjecturing, and painting frightful pictures, till she heard the crow of the early village cock, and the caw of the jackdaw wheeling close to the eaves as he took wing in the gray of the morning ; and yet Barney had not returned.

Not long after seven o'clock, Dr. Toole, with Juno, Cæsar, Dido, and Sneak at his heels, paid his half-friendly, half-professional visit at the Mills.

Poor little Mrs. Nutter was much better; and having comforted her, as well as he was able, he had a little talk with Moggy in the hall, and all about Nutter's disappearance, and how Mrs. Macan saw him standing by the river's brink, and that was the last any one near the house had seen of him; and a thought flashed upon Toole, and he was very near coming out with it, but checked himself, and only said—

"What hat had he on?"

So she told him.

"And was his name writ in it, or how was it marked?"

"Two big letters—a C and an N."

"I see; and do you remember any other mark you'd know it by?"

"Well, yes; I stitched the lining, only last month, with red silk, and that's how I remember the letters."

"I know; and are you sure it was that hat he had on?"

"Certain sure—why, there's all the rest;" and she con-ned them over, as they hung on their pegs on the rack before them.

"Now, don't let the mistress be down-hearted—keep her, Moggy, do you mind. I told her the master was with Lord Castlemallard since yesterday evening, on business, and don't you say any thing else; keep her quiet, do you mind, and humor her."

And away went Toole, at a swift pace, to the town again, and entered the barracks, and asked to see the Adjutant, and then to look at the hat the corporal had fished up by "Bloody Bridge;" and, by Jupiter! his heart gave a couple of great bounces, and he felt himself grow pale—they were the identical capitals, C N, and the clumsy red silk stitching in the lining.

Toole was off forthwith, and had a fellow dragging the river before three-quarters of an hour.

---

CHAPTER L.

CONCERNING A ROULEAU OF GUINEAS AND THE CRACK OF A PISTOL.

DANGERFIELD went up the river that morning with his rod and net, and h's piscatory fidus Achates, Irons at his elbow. It was a nice gray sky, but the clerk was unusually silent even for him; and the sardonio piscator del onda appeared inscrutably amused as he looked steadily upon the running waters. Once or twice the spectacles turned full upon the clerk, over Dangerfield's shoulder, with a cynical light, as if he were on the point of making one of his ironical jokes but he turned back again with a little whisk, the jest untold, whatever it was, to the ripple and the fly, and the coy gray troutlings.

At last, Dangerfield said over his shoulder, with the same amused look, "Do you remember Charles Archer?"

Irons turned pale, and looked down embarrassed as it seemed, and began plucking at a tangled piece of tackle, without making any answer.

"Hey? Irons," persisted Dangerfield, who was not going to let him off.

"Yes, I do," answered the man, surlily; "I remember him right well; but I'd rather not, and I won't speak of him, that's all."

"Well, Charles Archer's here, we've seen him, haven't we? and just the devil he always was," said Dangerfield with a deliberate chuckle, and evidently enjoying the clerk's embarrassment as he eyed him through his spectacles obliquely.

"He has seen you, too, he says; and thinks you have seen him, hey?" and Dangerfield chuckled more and more knowingly, and watched his shiftings and sulkings with a pleasant grin, as he teased and quizzed him in his own enigmatical way.

"Well, supposing I did see him" said Irons, looking up, returning Dangerfield's comic glance with a bold and lowering stare; "and supposing he saw me, so long as we've no business one of another, and never talks lies, nor seems to remember—I think 't isn't, no ways, no one's business—that's what I say."

"True, Irons, very true; you, I, and Sturk—the Doctor I mean—are cool fellows, and don't want for nerve; but I think, don't you? we're afraid of Charles Archer, for all that."

"Fear or no fear, I don't want no talk to him nor of him, no ways," replied the clerk, grimly, and looking as black as a thunder-cloud.

"Nor I neither, but you know he's here, and what a devil he is, and we can't help it," replied Dangerfield, very much tickled.

The clerk only looked through his nearly closed eyes, and with the same pale and surly aspect toward the point to which Dangerfield's casting line had floated, and observed,

"You'll lose them flies, sir."

"Hey!" said Dangerfield, and made another cast further into the stream.

"Whatever he may seem, and I think I know him pretty well," he continued, in the same sprightly way, "Charles Archer would dispose of each of us—you understand—without a scruple, precisely when and how best suited his convenience. Now Doctor Sturk has sent him a message, which I know will provoke him, when he gets it, for it sounds like a threat. If he reads it so, rely on't, he'll lay Sturk on his back, one way or another, and I'm sorry for him, for I wished him well ; but if he will play at brag with the devil, I can't help him."

" I'm a man that holds his tongue : I'm known for't ; I never talks none, even in my liquor. I'm a peaceable man, and no bully, and only wants to live quiet," said Irons, in a hurry.

" A disciple of my school, you're right, Irons, that's my way ; I never name Charles except to the two or three who meet him, and then only when I can't help it, just as you do ; fellows of that kidney I always take quietly, and I've prospered. Sturk would do well to reconsider his message. Were I in his shoes, I would not eat an egg or a gooseberry or drink a glass of fair water from that stream, while he was in the country, for fear of poison !' curse him ; and to think of Sturk expecting to meet him, and walk with him after such a message, together, as you and I do here. Do you see that tree ?"

It was a stout poplar, just a yard away from Irons' shoulder ; and as Dangerfield pronounced the word " tree," his hand rose and a sharp report of a pocket-pistol half-deafened Irons' ear.

" I say," said Dangerfield, with a startling laugh, observing Irons wince, and speaking as the puff of smoke crossed his face, " he'd lodge a bullet in the cur's heart, as suddenly as I've shot that tree ;" the bullet had hit the stem right in the centre, " and swear he was going to rob him."

Irons eyed him with a livid squint, but answered nothing. I think he acquiesced in Dangerfield's dreadful estimate of Charles Archer's character.

" But we must give the devil his due ; Charles can do a handsome thing sometimes. You shall judge. It seems he saw you, and you him—here in this town, some months ago, and each knew the other, and you've seen him since, and done likewise ; but you said nothing, and he liked your philosophy, and hopes you'll accept of this, which from its weight I take to be a little rouleau of guineas."

During this speech Irons seemed both angry and frightened, and looked darkly enough before him on the water ; and his lips were moving, as if he was imperfectly muttering a running commentary on it all the while.

When Dangerfield put the little roll in his hand, Irons looked suspicious and frightened, and balanced it in his palm, as if he had thoughts of chucking it from him, as though it were literally a satanic douceur. But it is hard to part with money, and Irons, though he still looked cowed and unhappy, put the money into his breeches' pocket, and he made a queer bow, and he said,

" You know, sir, I never asked a farthing."

" Ay, so he says," answered Dangerfield.

" And," with an imprecation, Irons added, " I never expected to be a shilling the better of him."

" He knows it ; and now you have the reason why I mentioned Charles Arthur ; and having placed that gold in your hand, I've done with him, and we shan't have occasion, I hope, to name his name for a good while to come," said Dangerfield.

Then came long silence, and Dangerfield applied himself in earnest to catch some trout, and when he had accomplished half-a-dozen, he tired altogether of the sport, and followed by Irons, he sauntered homewards, where astounding news awaited him

---

CHAPTER LI.

RELATING AFTER WHAT FASHION DR. STURK CAME HOME.

As Dangerfield, having parted company with Irons at the corner of the bridge, was walking through the town, with his rod over his shoulder and his basket of troutlings by his side, his attention was arrested by a little knot of persons in close and earnest talk at the barrack-gate, nearly opposite Sturk's house.

He distinguished at a glance the tall grim figure of Oliver Lowe, of Lucan, the sternest and shrewdest magistrate who held the commission for the county of Dublin in those days, mounted on his iron-gray hunter, and holding the crupper with his right hand, as he leaned toward a ragged, shaggy little urchin, with naked shins, whom he was questioning as it seemed closely. Half-a-dozen gaping villagers stood round.

There was an indescribable something about the group which indicated horror and excitement. Dangerfield quickened his pace, and arrived just as the Adjutant rode out.

Saluting both as he advanced, Dangerfield asked—

"Nothing amiss, I hope, gentlemen?"

"The Surgeon here's been found murdered in the Park!" answered Lowe.

"Hey—Sturk?" said Dangerfield.

"Yes," said the Adjutant; "this boy here says he's found him in the Butcher's Wood."

"The Butcher's Wood!—why, what the plague brought him there?" exclaimed Dangerfield.

"'Tis his straight road from Dublin across the Park," observed the magistrate.

"Oh!—I thought 'twas the wood by Lord Mountjoy's," said Dangerfield; "and when did it happen?"

"Pooh!—some time between yesterday afternoon and half an hour ago," answered Mr. Lowe.

"Nothing known?" said Dangerfield. "'Twill be a sad hearing over the way;" and he glared grimly with a little side-nod at the Doctor's house.

Then he fell, like the others, to questioning the boy. He could tell them but little—only the same story over and over. Coming out of town, with tea and tobacco, a pair of shoes, and a bottle of whiskey, for old Mrs. Tresham—in the thick of the Wood, among the brambles, all at once he lighted on the body. He could not mistake Dr. Sturk; he wore his regimentals; there was blood about him; he did not touch him, nor go nearer than a musket's length to him, and being frightened at the sight in that lonely place he ran away and right down to the barrack, where he made his report.

Just then out came Sergeant Bligh, with his men—two of them carrying a bier with a mattress and cloaks thereupon. They formed, and accompanied by the Adjutant, at quick step marched through the town for the Park. Mr. Lowe accompanied them, and in the Park-lane they picked up the ubiquitous Doctor Toole, who joined the party.

Dangerfield walked a while beside the Adjutant's horse; and, said he—

"I've had as much walking as I can well manage this morning, and you don't want for hands, so I'll turn back when I've said just a word in your ear. You know, sir, funerals are expensive, and I happen to know that poor Sturk was rather pressed for money—in fact, 'twas only the day before yesterday I myself lent him a trifle. So will you, through whatever channel you think best, let poor Mrs. Sturk know that she may draw upon me for a hundred pounds, if she requires it."

"Thank you, Mr. Dangerfield ; I certainly shall."

And so Dangerfield lifted his hat to the party and fell behind, and came to a stand still, watching them till they disappeared over the brow of the hill.

When he reached his little parlor in the Brass Castle luncheon was upon the table. But he had not much of an appetite, and stood at the window looking up the river with his hands in his pockets, and a strange pallid smile over his face, mingling with the light of the silver spectacles.

"When Irons hears of this," he said, "he'll come to my estimate of Charles Archer, and conclude he has had a finger in that pretty pie ; 'twill frighten him."

In the meantime the party, with Tim Brian, the bare-shanked urchin, still in a pale perspiration, for guide, marched on, all looking ahead, in suspense, and talking little.

On they marched, till they got into the bosky shadow of the close old whitethorn and brambles, and there, in a lonely nook, the small birds hopping on the twigs above, on his back, in his regimentals, lay the clay-colored image of Sturk, some blood, nearly black now, at the corners of his mouth, and under his stern brows a streak of white eye ball turned up to the sky.

There was a pool of blood under his head, more under his right arm, which was slightly extended, with the open hand thrown palm upwards, as if appealing to heaven.

Toole examined him.

"No pulse, by Jove ! Quiet there ; don't stir ?" Then he clapt his ear on Sturk's white Marseilles vest.

"Hush !" and a long pause. Then Toole rose erect, but still on his knees, " Will you be quiet there ? I think there's some little action still ; only don't talk, or shift your feet ; and just—just, do be quiet ?"

Then Toole rose to his knees again, with a side glance fixed on the face of Sturk, with a puzzled and alarmed look.

He evidently did not well know what to make of it. Then he slipped his hand within his vest, and between his shirt and his skin.

"If he's dead, he's not long so. There's warmth here. And see, get me a pinch or two of that thistle-down, d'ye see?"

And with the help of this improvised test he proceeded to try whether he was still breathing. But there was a little air stirring, and they could not manage it.

"Well?" said Toole, standing this time quite erect, "I—I think there's life there still. And now, boys, d'ye see? lift him very carefully, d'ye mind? Gently, very gently, for, I tell you, if this hæmorrhage begins again, he'll not last twenty seconds."

So on a cloak they lifted him softly and defly to the bier, and laid covering over him; and having received Toole's last injunctions, and especially a direction to Mrs. Sturk to place him in a well-warmed bed, and introduce a few spoonfuls of warm port wine negus into his mouth, and if he swallowed, to continue to administer it from time to time, Sergeant Bligh and his men commenced their funeral march toward Sturk's house.

"And now, Mr. Adjutant," said Lowe, "had not we best examine the ground, and make a search for anything that may lead to a conviction?"

Well, a ticket was found trod into the bloody mud, scarcely legible, and Sturk's cocked hat, the leaf and crown cut through with a blow of some blunt instrument. His sword they had found by his side not drawn.

"See! here's a foot-print, too," said Lowe; "don't move!"

It was remarkable. They pinned together the the backs of two letters, and Toole, with his surgical scissors, cut the pattern to fit exactly into the impression; and he and Lowe, with great care, pencilled in the well-defined marks of the great hob-nails, and a sort of seam or scar across the heel. It was in a slight dip in the ground where the soil continued soft. They found it in two other places coming up to the fatal spot, from the direction of the Magazine. And it was traceable on for some twenty yards more faintly; then, again, very distinctly, where—a sort of ditch interposing—a jump had been made, and here it turned down towards the Park wall and the Chapelizod-road, still, however, slanting in the Dublin direction.

In the hollow by the Park wall it appeared again, distinctly; and here it was plain the transit of the wall had been made, for the traces of the mud were evident enough upon its surface, and the mortar at top was displaced, and a little tuft of grass in the mud, left by the clodded shoe-sole. Here the fellow had got over.

They followed, and, despairing of finding it upon the road, they diverged into the narrow slip of ground by the river bank, and just within the Park-gate, in a slight hollow, the clay of which was still impressible, they found the track again. It led close up to the river bank, and there the villain seemed to have come to a stand still; for the sod, just for so much as a good sized sheet of letter-paper might cover, was trod and broken.

From this stand-point they failed to discover any receding foot-print; but close by it came a little horse track, covered with shingle, by which, in those days, the troops used to ride their horses to water. He might have stept upon this, and following it, taken to the streets; or he might—and this was Lowe's theory—have swum the river at this point, and got into some of those ruffian haunts in the rear of Watling and St. James's streets. So Lowe rode round to the opposite bank, first telling Toole, who did not care to press his services at Sturk's house, uninvited, that he would send out the great Doctor Pell to examine the patient, or the body, as the case might turn out.

By this time they were carrying Doctor Sturk up his own stair-case—his pale wife sobbing and shivering on the landing, among whispering ejaculations from the maids, and the speechless wonder of the awe-stricken children, staring through the banisters—to lay him in the bed where at last he is to lie without dreaming.

---

CHAPTER LII.

IN WHICH MISS MAGNOLIA MACNAMARA AND DR. TOOLE, IN DIFFERENT SCENES, PROVE THEMSELVES GOOD SAMARITANS; AND THE GREAT DOCTOR PELL MOUNTS THE STAIRS OF THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD.

So pulse or no pulse, dead or alive, they got Sturk into his bed.

Poor, cowed, quiet little Mrs. Sturk, went quite wild at the bedside.

"He's gone—he'll never speak again. Do you think he hears? Oh, Barney, my darling—Barney, it's your own poor little Letty—oh—Barney, darling, don't you hear?"

But it was the same stern face, and ears of stone. There was no answer and no sign.

And she sent a pitiful entreaty to Doctor Toole, who came very good-naturedly; and he shook her very cordially by the hand, and quite "filled up," at her wobegone appeal, and told her she must not despair yet.

And this time he pronounced most positively that Sturk was still living. And as the warmth of the bed began to tell, the signs of life showed themselves more and more unequivocally. But Toole knew that his patient was in a state of coma, from which he had no hope of his emerging.

So poor little Mrs. Sturk—as white as the plaster on the wall—who kept her imploring eyes fixed on the Doctor's ruddy countenance, during his moments of deliberation, burst out into a flood of tears, and thanksgivings, and benedictions.

“He'll recover—something tells me he'll recover. Oh! my Barney—darling—you will—you will.”

“While there's life—you know—my dear ma'am,” said Toole, doing his best. “But then—you see—he's been very badly abused about the head; and the brain—you know—is the great centre—the—the—but, as I said, while there's life, there's hope.”

“And he's so strong—he shakes off an illness so easily! he has such courage.”

“Well, well, ma'am, there certainly have been wonderful recoveries.”

“And he's so much better already, you see, and I know so well how he gets through an illness, 'tis wonderful, and he certainly is mightily improved since we got him to bed. Why, I can see him breathe now, and you know it must be a good sign; and then there's a merciful God over us—and all the poor little children—what would become of us?” And then she wiped her eyes quickly. “The promise, you know, of length of days—it often comforted me before—to those that honor father and mother; and I believe there never was so good a son. Oh! my noble Barney, never: 'tis my want of reliance and trust in the Almighty's goodness.”

And so, holding Toole by the cuff of his coat, and looking piteously into his face as they stood together in the doorway, the poor little woman argued thus with inexorable death.

About poor Mrs. Nutter's illness, and the causes of it, various stories were current in Chapelizod. Some have heard it was a Blackamore witch who had evoked the foul fiend in bodily shape from the parlor cupboard, and that he had with his cloven foot kicked her and Sally Nutter round the apartment until their screams brought in Charles Nutter, who was smoking in the garden ; and that on entering, he would have fared as badly as the rest, had he not had presence of mind to pounce at once upon the great family Bible that lay on the window-sill, with which he belabored the infernal intruder to a purpose. Others reported 'twas the ghost of old Philip Nutter, who rose through the floor, and talked I know not what awful rhotomantade. These were the confabulations of the tap-room and the kitchen ; but the speculation and rumors current over the card-table and claret-glasses were hardly more congruous or intelligible. In fact, nobody knew well what to make of it. Nutter certainly had disappeared, and there was an uneasy feeling about him. The sinister terms on which he and Sturk had stood were quite well known, and though nobody spoke out, every one knew pretty well what his neighbor was thinking of.

Our blooming friend, the handsome and stalworth Magnolia, having got a confidential hint from agitated Mrs. Mack, trudged up to the mills, in a fine frenzy, vowing vengeance on Mary Matchwell, for she liked poor Sally Nutter well. And when, with all her roses in her cheeks, and her saucy black eyes flashing vain lightnings across the room in pursuit of the vanished woman in sable, the Amazon with black hair and slender waist comforted and pitied poor Sally, and anathematised her cowardly foe, it must be confessed she looked plaguely handsome, wicked, and good-natured.

"Mary Matchwell, indeed ! I'll match her well, wait a while, you'll see if I don't. Arrah ! Don't be crying, child, do you hear me. What's that ? Charles ? Why, then, is it about Charles you're crying ? Charles Nutter ? Phiat ! woman dear ! don't you think he's come to an age to take care of himself ? I'll hold you a crown he's in Dublin with the sheriff, going to cart that jade to bridewell. And why in the world didn't you send for me, when you wanted to discourse Mary Matchwell? Where was the good of my poor dear mother? Why, she's as soft as butter. 'Twas a devil like me you wanted, you poor little darling. Do you think I'd a let her frighten you this way—the vixin—I'd a kicked her through the window as soon as look at her. She saw with half an eye she could frighten you both, poor things. Oh! ho! how I wish I was here. I'd a put her across my knee and—no—do you say? Pooh! you don't know me, you poor innocent little creature; and, do ye mind me now, you must not be moping here, Sally Nutter, all alone, you'll just come down to us, and drink a cup of tea and play a round game, and hear the news; and look up now and give me a kiss, for I like you, Sally, you kind old girl."

And she gave her a hug, and a shake, and half-a-dozen kisses on each cheek, and laughed merrily, and scolded and kissed her again.

That night, at nine o'clock, the great Doctor Pell arrived in his coach, with steaming horses, at Sturk's hall-door. And the Doctor strode up, directed by the whispering awe-struck maid, to Sturk's bed-chamber, without asking questions, or hesitating on lobbies, for the sand of his minutes ran out in gold-dust. So, with a sort of awe and suppressed bustle proceeding and following him, he glided upstairs and straight to the patient's bedside, serene, saturnine, and rapid.

In a twinkling the maid was running down the street for Toole, who had kept at home, in state costume, expecting the consultation with the great man, which he liked. And up came Toole, with his brows knit, and his chin high, marching over the pavement in a mighty fuss, for he knew that the oracle's time and temper were not to be trifled with.

In the club, Larry the drawer, as he set a pint of mulled claret by old Arthur Slowe's elbow, whispered something in his ear, with a solemn wink.

"Ho! by Jove, gentlemen, the Doctor's come—Doctor Pell. His coach stands at Sturk's door, Larry says, and we'll soon hear how he fares." And up got Major O'Neill with a "hey! ho—ho?" and out he went, followed by old Slowe, with his little tankard in his fist, to the inn-door where the Major looked on the carriage, lighted up by the footman's flambeau, beneath the old village elm—up the street—smoking his pipe still to keep it burning, and communicating with Slowe, two words at a time. And Slowe stood gazing at the same object with his little faded blue eyes, his disengaged hand in his breeches' pocket, and ever and anon wetting his lips with his hot cordial, and assenting agreeably to the Major's conclusions.

"Seize ace! curse it!" cried Cluffe, who I'm happy to say, had taken no harm by his last night's wetting; "another gammon, I'll lay you fifty."

"Toole, I dare that, will look in and tell us how poor Sturk goes on," said Puddock, playing his throw.

"Hang it, Puddock, mind your game—to be sure he will. Cinque ace! well, curse it! the same throw over again. 'Tis too bad. I missed taking you last time, with that stupid blot you've covered—and now, by Jove, it ruins me. There's no playing when fellows are getting up every minute to gape after doctors' coaches, and leaving the door open—hang it, I've lost the game by it—gammoned twice already. 'Tis very pleasant. I only wish when gentlemen interrupt play, they'd be good enough to pay the bets."

It was not much, about five shillings altogether, and little Puddock had not often a run of luck.

"If you'd like to win it back, Captain Cluffe, I'll give you a chance," said O'Flaherty, who was tolerably sober. "I'll lay you an even guinea Sturk's dead before nine tomorrow morning ; and two to one he's dead before this time to-morrow night."

Dangerfield, who was overlooking the party, with his back to the fire, appeared displeased at their levity—shook his head, and was on the point of speaking one of those polite but cynical reproofs, whose irony, cold and intangible, intimidated the less potent spirits of the club-room. But he dismissed it with a little shrug. And a minute after, Major O'Neill and Arthur Slowe became aware that Dangerfield had glided behind them, and was looking serenely, like themselves, at the Dublin doctor's carriage and smoking team.

"'Tis a sorry business, gentlemen," he said in a stern, subdued tone. "Seven children and a widow. He's not dead yet, though : whatever Toole might do, the Dublin doctor would not stay with a dead man ; time's precious. I can't describe how I pity that poor soul, his wife—what's to become of her and his helpless brood I know not."

---

CHAPTER LIII.

IN WHICH DR. TOOLE, IN FULL COSTUME, STANDS UPON THE HEARTH-STONE OF THE CLUB, AND ILLUMINATES
THE COMPANY WITH HIS BACK TO THE FIRE.

Two or three minutes later, the hall-door of Sturk's mansion opened wide, and the figure of the renowned Doctor from Dublin glided swiftly down the steps, and disappeared into his coach with a sharp clang of the door. Up jumps the footman, and gives his link a great whirl about his head. The maid stands on the step with her hand before the flaring candle. "The Turk's Head, in Werburgh-street," shouts the footman, and smack goes the coachman's whip, and away went the carriage.

"He has ten guineas in his pocket for that—a guinea a minute, by Jove, coining, no less," said the Major, whose pipe was out, and he thinking of going in to replenish it. "We'll have Toole here presently, depend upon it."

He had hardly spoken when Toole, in a glare of candle-light, emerged from Sturk's hall-door. With one foot on the steps, the Doctor paused to give a parting direction about the chicken broth and white-wine whey.

These last injunctions on the door-steps had begun, perhaps in a willingness to let folks see and even hear that the visit was professional; and along with the lowering and awfully serious countenance with which they were delivered, had grown into a habit, so that, as now, he practised them even in solitude and darkness.

Then Toole was seen to approach the Phoenix, in full blow, his cane under his arm. With his full-dressed wig on, he was always grand and Æsculapian, and reserved withal, and walked with a measured tread, and a sad and important countenance, which somehow made him look more chubby; and he was a good deal more formal with his friends at the inn-door, and took snuff before he answered them. But this only lasted some eight or ten minutes after a consultation or momentous visit, and would melt away insensibly in the glow of the club-parlor, sometimes reviving for a minute, when the little mirror that sloped forward from the wall, showed him a passing portrait of his grand wig and toggery. And it was pleasant to observe how the old fellows unconsciously deferred to this temporary self-assertion, and would call him, not Tom, nor Toole, but "Doctor," or "Doctor Toole," when the fit was upon him.

"Your most obedient, gentlemen—your most obedient," said Toole, bowing and taking their hands graciously in the hall—"a darkish evening, gentlemen."

"And how does your patient, Doctor?" inquired Major O'Neill.

The Doctor closed his eyes, and shook his head slowly, with a gentle shrug.

"He's in a bad case, Major. There's little to be said, and that little, sir, not told in a moment," answered Toole, and took snuff.

"How's Sturk, sir?" repeated the silver spectacles, a little sternly.

"Well, sir, he's not dead; but, by your leave, had not we better go into the parlor, eh?—'tis a little chill, and, as I said, 'tis not all told in a moment—he's not dead, though, that's the sum of it—you first, pray proceed, gentlemen."

Dangerfield firmly took him at his word; but the polite Major got up a little ceremonious tussle with Toole in the hall. However, it was no more than a matter of half-a-dozen bows and waves of the hand, and "after you, sir;" and Toole entered, and after a general salutation in the style of Doctor Pell, he established himself upon the hearth stone, with his back to the fire, as a legitimate oracle.

Toole was learned, as he loved to be among the laity on such occasions, and was in no undue haste to bring his narrative to a close. But the gist of the matter was this—Sturk was laboring under concussion of the brain, and two terrific fractures of the skull—so long, and lying so near together; that he and Doctor Pell instantly saw 'twould be impracticable to apply the trepan; in fact, that 'twould be certain and instantaneous death. He was absolutely insensible, but his throat was not yet palsied, and he could swallow a spoonful of broth or sack whey from time to time. But he was a dead man to all intents and purposes. He might last two or three days, or even a week—what did it signify?—what was he better than a corpse already? He could never hear, see, speak, or think again ; and for any difference it could possibly make to poor Sturk, they might clap him in his grave and cover him up to-night.

Then the talk turned upon Nutter. Every man had his theory or his conjecture but Dangerfield, who maintained a discreet reserve, much to the chagrin of the others, who thought, not without reason, that he knew more about the state of his affairs, especially of his relations with Lord Castlemallard, than perhaps all the world beside.

"Possibly, poor fellow, he was not in a condition to have his accounts overhauled, and on changing an agency things sometimes come out that otherwise might have kept quiet. He was the sort of fellow who would go through with a thing ; and if he thought the best way on going out of the agency was to go out of the world also, out he'd go."

But there was a haunting undivulged suspicion in the minds of each. Every man knew what his neighbor was thinking of, though he did not care to ask about his ugly dreams, or to relate his own. They all knew what sort of terms Sturk and Nutter had been on. They tried to put the thought away, for though Nutter was not a joker, nor a songster, nor a story-teller, yet they liked him. Besides, Nutter might possibly turn up in a day or two, and in that case 'twould go best with those who had not risked an atrocious conjecture about him in public.

---

CHAPTER LIV.

IN WHICH DR. TOOLE AND MR. LOWE MAKE A VISIT AT THE MILLS, AND RECOGNIZE SOMETHING REMARKABLE WHILE THERE.

THE next day the Sabbath bell from the ivied tower of Chapelized church, called all good churchfolks to their pews and seats. After church, Dr. Toole, walking up to the Mills, to pay an afternoon visit to poor little Mrs. Nutter, was overtaken by Mr. Lowe, the magistrate, who brought his tall, iron-gray hunter to a walk as he reached him.

"Any tidings of Nutter?" asked he, after they had, in old world phrase, given one another the time of day.

"Not a word," said the Doctor; "I don't know what to make of it; but you know what's thought. The last place he was seen in was his own garden. The river was plaguey swollen Friday night, and just where he stood it's deep enough, I can tell you. He was consumedly in the dumps, poor fellow; and between ourselves, he was a resolute dog, and atrabillious, and just the fellow to make the jump into kingdom-come if the maggot bit: and you know his hat was fished out of the river a long way down. They dragged next morning, but—pish!—'twas all nonsense and moonshine; why, there was water enough to carry him to Rings-end in an hour. He was a good deal out of sorts, as I said, latterly—a shabby design, sir, to thrust him out of my Lord Castlemallard's agency; but that's past and gone; and, besides, I have reason to know there was some kind of an excitement a—an—agitation—or a bad news—or something—just before he went out; and so, poor Nutter, you see, it looks very like as if he had done something rash."

Talking thus, they reached the Mills by the river side, not far from Knockmaroon.

On learning that Toole was about making a call there, Lowe gave his bridle to a little Chapelized raggamuffin, and, dismounting, accompanied the Doctor. Mrs. Nutter was in her bed.

"Make my service to your mistress," said Toole, "and say I'll look in on her in five minutes, if she'll admit me." And Lowe and the Doctor walked on to the garden and so, side by side, down to the river's bank.

"Hey!—look at that," said Toole, with a start, in a hard whisper; and he squeezed Lowe's arm very hard, and looked as if he saw a snake.

It was the impression in the mud of the same peculiar footprint they had tracked so far in the Park. There was a considerable pause, during which Lowe stooped down to examine the details of the footmark.

"Hang it—you know—poor Mrs. Nutter—eh?" said Toole, and hesitated.

"We must make a note of that—the thing's important," said Mr. Lowe, sternly fixing his gray eye upon Toole.

"Certainly, sir," said the Doctor, bridling;—"I should not like to be the man to hit him—you know; but it is remarkable—and, curse it, sir, if called on, I'll speak the truth as straight as you, sir—every bit, sir."

The Magistrate opened his pocket-book, took forth the pattern sole, carefully superimposed it, called Toole's attention, and said—

"You see."

Toole nodded hurriedly; and just then the maid came out to ask him to see her mistress.

"I say, my good woman," said Lowe; "just look here. Whose footprint is that—do you know it?"

"Oh, why, to be sure I do. Isn't it the master's brogues?" she replied, frightened, she knew not why, after the custom of her kind.

"You observe that?" and he pointed specially to the transverse line across the heel. "Do you know that?"

The woman assented.

"Who made or mended these shoes?"

"Bill Heaney, the shoemaker, down in Martin's-row, there—t'was he made them, and mended them, too, sir."

So he came to a perfect identification, and then an authentication of his paper pattern; then she could say they were certainly the shoes he wore on Friday night—in fact, every other pair he had were then on the shoe-stand on the lobby. So Lowe entered the house, and got pen and ink, and continued to question the maid and make little notes; and the other maid knocked at the parlor-door with a message to Toole.

Lowe urged his going; and somehow Toole thought the Magistrate suspected him of making signs to his witness, and he departed ill at ease. Stunned and agitated, and so with his hand on the clumsy banister he strode up the dark staircase, and round the little corner in the lobby, to Mrs. Nutter's door.

"Oh! madam, 'twill all come right, be sure," said Toole uncomfortably, responding to a vehement and rambling appeal of poor Mrs. Nutter's.

"And do you really think it will? Oh, Doctor, Doctor, do you think it will? The last two or three nights and days—how many is it?—oh, my poor head—it seems like a month since he went away. And where do you think he is—do you think it's business?"

"Of course 'tis business, ma'am."

"And—and—oh, Doctor!—you really think he's safe?"

"Of course, madam, he's safe—what's to ail him?"

"But, Doctor," pleaded the poor lady, "you don't know—I—I'm terrified—I—I—I'll never be the same again," and she burst into hysterical crying.

"Now, really, madam—confound it—my dear, good lady —you see—this will never do”—he was uncorking and smelling at the bottles in search of “the drops”—“and—and—here they are—and isn’t it better, ma’am, you should be well and hearty—here, drink this—when—he comes back—don’t you see—than—a—a”—

“But—oh, I wish I could tell you. She said—she said—the—the—oh, you don’t know.”

“She—who? Who said what?” cried Toole, lending his ear, for he never refused a story.

“Oh! Doctor, he’s gone—I’ll never—never—I know I’ll never see him again. Tell me he’s not gone—tell me I’ll see him again.”

“Hang it, can’t she stick to one thing at a time—the poor woman’s half out of her wits,” said Toole, provoked; “I’ll wager a dozen of claret there’s more on her mind than she told to any one.”

Before he could bring her round to the subject again, the Doctor was called down to Lowe; so he took his leave for the present; and after his talk with the magistrate, he did not care to go up again to poor little Mrs. Nutter; and Moggy was as white as ashes standing by, for Mr. Lowe had just made her swear to her little story about the shoes; and Toole walked home to the village with a heavy heart, and a good deal out of humor.

Toole knew that a warrant would be issued next day against Nutter. The case against him was black enough. Still, even supposing he had struck those trenchant blows over Sturk’s head, it did not follow that it was without provocation or in cold blood. It looked however, altogether so unpromising, that he would have been almost relieved to hear that Nutter’s body had been found drowned in the river.

---

CHAPTER LV.

IN WHICH ONE OF LITTLE BOPPEP'S SHEEP COMES HOME AGAIN, AND VARIOUS THEORIES ARE ENTERTAINED RESPECTING CHARLES NUTTER AND LIEUTENANT PUDDOCK.

Just on Monday morning, in the midst of this hurly-burly, who should arrive, of all people in the world, and re-establish himself, in his old quarters, but Dick Devereux. The gallant Captain was more splendid and handsome than ever. But both his spirits and his habits had suffered. He had quarrelled with his aunt, and she was his bread and butter—ay, buttered on both sides. How lightly these young fellows quarrel with the foolish old worshippers who lay their gold, frankincense, and myrrh, at the feet of the handsome, thankless idols. They think it all independence and high spirit, whereas we know it is nothing but a little egotistical tyranny, that unconsciously calculates even in the heyday of its indulgence upon the punctual return of the penitent old worshipper, with his or her votive offerings.

Perhaps the gipsy had thought better of it, and was already sorry he had not kept the peace. At all events, though his toilet and wardrobe were splendid, yet morally he was seedy, and in temper soured. His duns had found him out, and pursued him in wrath and alarm to England, and pestered him very seriously indeed. He owed money beside to several of his brother officers, and it was not pleasant to face them without a guinea. An evil propensity, at which, as you remember, General Chattsworth hinted, had grown amid his distresses, and the sting of self-reproach exasperated him. Then there was his old love for Lillias Walsingham, and the pang of rejection, and the hope of a strong passion sometimes leaping high and bright, and sometimes flickering into ghastly shadows and darkness.

Toole, passing by, saw him in the window. Devereux smiled and nodded, and the Doctor stopped short at the railings, and grinned up in return, and threw out his arms to express surprise, and then snapped his fingers, and cut a little caper, as though he would say—"Now, you're come back—we'll have fun and fiddling again." And forthwith he began to bawl his inquiries and salutations. But Devereux called him up peremptorily, for he wanted to hear the news—especially all about the Walsinghams. And up came Toole, and they had a great shaking of hands, and the Doctor opened his budget, and rattled away.

Of Sturk's tragedy and Nutter's disappearance he had already heard. And he now heard some of the club gossip, and all about Dangerfield's proposal for Gertrude Chatterworth, and how the old people were favorable, and the young lady averse—and how Dangerfield was content to leave the question in abeyance, and did not seem to care a jackstraw what the townspeople said or thought—and then he came to the Walsinghams, and Devereux for the first time really listened. The Doctor was very well—just as usual; and wondering what had become of his old crony, Dan Loftus, from whom he had not heard for several months; and Miss Lily was not very well—a delicacy here (and he tapped his capacious chest), like her poor mother. "Pell and I consulted about her, and agreed she was to keep within doors." And then he went on, for he had a suspicion of the real state of relations between him and Lily, and narrated the occurrence rather with a view to collect evidence from his looks and manner, than from any simpler motive; and, said he, "Only think, that confounded wench, Nan—you know—Nan Glynn." And he related her and her mother's visit to Miss Lily, and a subsequent call made to the Rector himself—all, it must be confessed, very much as it really happened. And Devereux first grew so pale as almost to frighten Toole, and then broke into a savage fury—and did not spare hard words, oaths, or maledictions. Then off went Toole, when things grew quieter, upon some other theme, giggling and punning, spouting scandal and all sorts of news—and Devereux was looking full at him with large stern eyes, not hearing a word more. His soul was cursing old Mrs. Glynn, of Palmers-town—that mother of lies, and what not—and remonstrating with old Dr. Walsingham—and protesting wildly against everything.

General Chatterworth, who returned two or three weeks after, was not half pleased to see Devereux. He had heard a good deal about him and his doings over the water, and did not like them. And the handsome Captain had not been three weeks in Chapelizod, when more than the General suspected that he was in nowise improved. So General Chatterworth did not often see or talk with him; and when he did, was rather reserved and lofty with him. His appointment on the staff was in abeyance—in fact, the vacancy on which it was expectant had not definitively occurred—and all things were at sixes and sevens with poor Dick Devereux.

That evening, strange to say, Sturk was still living; and Toole reported him exactly in the same condition. But what did that signify? 'Twas all one. The man was dead—as dead to all intents and purposes that moment as he would be that day twelvemonth, or that day hundred years.

Dr. Walsingham, who had just been to see poor Mrs. Sturk—now grown into the habit of waiting, and sustained by the intense quiet fuss of the sick room—stopped for a moment at the door of the Phoenix, to answer the cronies there assembled, who had seen him emerge from the murdered man's house.

“He is in a profound lethargy,” said the worthy divine.

" 'Tis a subsidence—his life, sir, stealing away like the fluid from the clepsydra—less and less left every hour—a little time will measure all out."

"What the plague's a clepsydra?" asked Cluffe of Toole, as they walked side by side into the club-room.

"Ho! pooh! one of those fabulous tumors of the epidermis mentioned by Pliny, you know, exploded ten centuries ago—ha, ha, ha!" and he winked and laughed derisively, and said, "Sure you know Dr. Walsingham."

And the gentlemen began spouting their theories about the murder and Nutter, in a desultory way; for they all knew the warrant was out against him.

"My opinion," said Toole, knocking out the ashes of his pipe upon the hob; for he held his tongue while smoking, and very little at any other time; "and I'll lay a guinea 'twill turn out as I say—the poor fellow's drowned himself. Few knew Nutter—I doubt if any one knew him as I did. Why he did not seem to feel anything, and you'd ha' swore nothing affected him, more than that hob, sir; and all the time, there wasn't a more thin-skinned, atrabillious poor dog in all Ireland—but honest, sir—thorough steel, sir. All I say is, if he had a finger in that ugly pie, you know, as some will insist, I'll stake my head to a china orange, 'twas a fair front to front fight. By Jupiter, sir, there wasn't one drop of cur's blood in poor Nutter. No, poor fellow, neither sneak nor assassin there"——

"They thought he drowned himself from his own garden—poor Nutter," said Major O'Neill.

"Well, that he did not," said Toole. "That unlucky shoe, you know, tells a tale; but for all that, I'm clear of the opinionion that drowned he is. We tracked the step, Lowe and I, to the bank, near the horse-track, in Bartack-street, just where the water deepens—there's usually five feet of water there, and that night there was little short of ten. Now, take it, that Nutter and Sturk had a tussle—and the thing happened, you know—and Sturk got the worst of it, and was, in fact laid dead at his feet, why, you know the kind of panic a poor dog, finding himself so situated, would be in—with the bitter, old quarrel between them—d'ye see? And this, at the back of his vapors and blue-devils, for he was dumpish enough before, would send a man like Nutter into a resolution of making away with himself; and that's how it happened, you may safely swear."

"And what do you think, Mr. Dangerfield?" asked the Major.

"Upon my life," said Dangerfield, briskly, lowering his newspaper to his knee, with a sharp rustle, "these are questions I don't like to meddle in. Certainly, he had considerable provocation, as I happen to know; and there was no love lost—that I know too. But I quite agree with Dr. Toole—if he was the man, I venture to say, 'twas a fair fight. Suppose, first, an altercation, then a hasty blow—Sturk had his cane, and a deuced heavy one—he wasn't a fellow to go down without knowing the reason why; and if they find Nutter, dead or alive, I venture to say he'll show some marks of it about him."

Cluffe wished the whole company, except himself, at the bottom of the Red Sea; for he was taking his revenge of Puddock, and had already lost a gammon and two hits. Little Puddock won by the force of the dice. He was not much of a player; and the sight of Dangerfield—that repulsive, impenetrable, moneyed man, who had "overcome him like a summer cloud," when the sky of his fortunes looked clearest and sunniest, always led him to Belmont, and the side of his lady-love.

If Cluffe's mind wandered in that direction his reveries were rather comfortable. He had his own opinion about his progress with Aunt Rebecca, who had come to like his conversation, and talked with him a great deal about Puddock, and always with ascerbity. Cluffe, who was a sort of patron of Puddock's, always, to do him justice, defended him respectfully. And Aunt Rebecca would listen very attentively, and then shake her head, and say,

"You're a great deal too good-natured, Captain; and he'll never thank you for your pains, never—I can tell you."

Well, Cluffe knew that the higher powers favored Dangerfield; and that, beside his absurd sentiment, not to say passion, which could not but be provoking, Puddock's complicity in the abortive hostilities of poor Nutter and the gallant O'Flaherty rankled in Aunt Becky's heart. She was, indeed, usually appeasable and forgiving enough; but in this case her dislike seemed inveterate and vindictive; and she would say—

"Well, let's talk no more of him; 'tis easy finding a more engaging subject; but you don't deny, Captain, that 'twas an unworthy hypocrisy, his pretending to sentiments against duelling to me, and then engaging as second in one on the very first opportunity that presented."

---

CHAPTER LVI.

TELLING HOW A COACH DREW UP AT THE ELMS, AND TWO FINE LADIES, DRESSED FOR THE BALL, STEPPED IN.

It was now more than a fortnight since Sturk's mishap in the Butcher's Wood, and he was still alive, but still under the spell of coma. He was sinking, but very slowly; yet it was enough to indicate the finality of that "life in death."

Dangerfield once or twice attacked Toole rather tartly about Sturk's case.

"Can nothing be done to make him speak? five minutes' consciousness would unravel the mystery."

Then Toole, would shrug, and say, "Pooh—pooh! my dear sir, you know nothing."

"Why, there's life?"

"Ay, the mechanical functions of life, but the brain's overpowered," replied Toole, with a wise frown.

"Well, relieve it."

"By Jupiter, sir, you make me laugh," cried Toole, with a grin, throwing up his eyebrows. "I take it, you think we doctors can work miracles."

"Quite the reverse, sir," retorted Dangerfield, with a cold scoff. "But you say he may possibly live six weeks more; and all that time the wick is smouldering, though the candle's short—can't you blow it in, and give us even one minute's light?"

"Ay, a smouldering wick and a candle if you please; but enclosed in a glass bottle, how the deuce are you to blow it?"

"Pish!" said the silver spectacles, with an icy flash from his glasses.

"Why, sir, you'll excuse me—but you don't understand," said Toole, a little loftily. "There are two contused wounds along the scalp as long as that pencil—the whole line of each partially depressed, the depression all along being deep enough to lay your finger in. You can ask Irons, who dresses them when I'm out of the way."

"I'd rather ask you, sir," replied Dangerfield, in turn a little high.

"Well, you can't apply the trepan, the surface is too extended, and all unsound, and won't bear it—'twould be simply killing him on the spot—don't you see; and there's no way else to relieve him."

General Chatterworth had not returned. On his way home he had wandered aside; and visited the fashionable wells of Buxton, intending a three days' sojourn, to complete his bracing up for the winter. But the Pool of Siloam did not work pleasantly in the case of the robust General, who was attacked after his second dip with a smart fit of the gout in his left great-toe, where it went on charmingly, without any flickering upward, quite stationary and natural for three weeks.

About the end of which time the period of the annual ball given by the officers of the Royal Irish Artillery arrived. It was a great event in the town. Aunt Becky and Gertrude drew up at the Elms, the Rector's house, with every thing very handsome about them, and two laced footmen, with flambeaux, and went in to see little Lily, on their way to the ball, and to show their dresses, and to promise to come the next day and tell her all the news; for Lily, as I mentioned, was an invalid, and balls and flicflacs were not for her.

Little Lily smiled her bright girlish smile, and threw both her arms round grand Aunt Becky's neck.

"You good, dear Aunt Becky, 'twas so kind and like you to come—you and Gertie. And, oh, Gemine! what a grand pair of ladies!" and she made a little rustic courtesy, like Nell in the farce. "And I never saw this before (a near peep at Gertrude's necklace), and Aunt Becky, what beautiful lace. And does not she look handsome, Gertie? I never saw her look so handsome. She'll be the finest figure there. There's no such delicate waist anywhere." And she set her two slender little forefingers and thumbs together, as if spanning it. "You've no chance beside her, Gertie; she'll set all the young fellows a-sighing and simpering."

"You wicked little rogue! I'll beat you black and blue, for making fun of Aunt Becky," cried Mrs. Rebecca, and ran a little race at her, about two inches to a step; her fan raised in her finger and thumb, and a jolly smile twinkling in her face, for she knew it was true about her waist, and she liked to be quizzed by the darling little girl. Her diamonds were on too, and her last look in her mirror had given her a satisfactory assurance, and she always played with little Lily, when they met; every one grew gay and girlish with her.

So they staid a full quarter of an hour, and the footman coughing laboriously outside the window reminded Aunt Rebecca at last how time flew; and Lily was for sitting down and playing a minuet and a country dance, and making them rehearse their steps, and calling in old Sally to witness the spectacles before they went; and so she and Aunt Becky had another little sportive battle—they never met, and seldom parted, without one. How was it that when gay little Lily provoked these little mimic skirmishes Aunt Becky would look for a second or two an inexpressibly soft and loving look upon her, and become quite girlish and tender. I think there is a way to every heart, and some few have the gift to reach it unconsciously and all ways.

So away rustled the great ladies, leaving Lily excited and she stood at the window, with flushed cheek, and her fingers on the sash, looking after them, and she came back with a little smile and tears in her eyes. She sat down, with a great color in her cheeks, and did play a country dance, and then a merry old Irish air, full of frolic and spirit, on the harpsichord; and gentle old Sally's face peeped in with a wistful smile, at the unwonted sounds.

"Come, sober old Sally, my sweetheart! I've taken a whim in my head, and you shall dress me, for to the ball I'll go."

"Tut, tut, Miss Lily, darling," said old Sally, with a smile and a shake of the head. "What would the doctors say?"

"What they please, my dasling."

And up stood little Lily, with her bright color and lustrous eyes.

"Angel' bright!" said the old woman, looking in that beloved and lovely young face, and quite "filling up," as the saying is, "there is not your peer on earth—no—not one among them all to compare with our Miss Lillias," and she paused, smiling, and then she said—"But, my darling, sure you know you wern't outside the door this five weeks."

"And is not that long enough, and too long, to shut me up, you cruel old woman? Come, come, Sally, girl, I'm resolved, and too the ball I'll go; don't be frightened. I'll cover my head, and only just peep in, muffled up, for ten minutes; and I'll go and come in the chair, and what harm can I take by it?"

Was it spirit? Did she want to show the folk that she did not shrink from meeting somebody; or that, though really ill, she ventured to peep in, through sheer liking for the scrape of the fiddle, and the fun, to show them that at least she was not heart-sick? Or was it the mysterious attraction, the wish to see him once more, just through her hood, far away, with an unseen side glance, and to build endless speculations, and weave the filmy web of hope, for who knows how long, out of these airy tints, a strange, sad smile, or deep wild glance, just seen and fixed for ever in memory? She had given him up in words, but her heart had not given him up. Poor little Lily! She hoped all that was so bad in him would one day mend. He was a hero still—and, oh! she hoped, would be true to her. So Lily's love, she scarce knew how, lived on this hope—the wildest of all wild hopes—waiting on the reformation of a rake.

"But, darling Miss Lily, don't you know the poor master would break his heart if he thought you could do such a wild thing as to go out again' the doctors' orders, at this time o' night, and into that hot place, and out again among the cold draughts."

Little Lily paused.

" 'Tis only a step, Sally ; do you honestly think it would vex him ? "

" Vex him, darling ? no, but break his heart. Why, he's never done asking about you, and—oh ! it's only joking you are, my darling, that's all."

" No, Sally, dear love, I meant it," said little Lily, sadly ; " but I suppose it was a wild thought, and I'm better at home."

And she played a march that had somehow a dash of the pathetic in it, in a sort of reverie, and she said :

" Sally, do you know that ? "

And Sally's gentle face grew reflective, and she said :

" Sure Miss Lily, that's the tune—isn't it—the Artillery plays when they march out to the park ? "

Lily nodded and smiled, and the tune moved on, conjuring up its pictured reverie. She stood in the sunny street, again a little child, holding old Sally by the hand, on a soft summer day. The sentries presented arms, and the corps marched out resplendent. Old General Chatterworth, as proud as Lucifer, on Bombardier, who nods and champs prancing and curvetting, to the admiration of the boys and terror of the women ; but at heart the mildest of quadrupeds, though passing, like an impostor as he was, for a devil incarnate ; the band thundering melodiously that dashing plaintive march, and exhilarating and firing the souls of all Chapelized. Up went the windows all along the street, the rabble-rout of boys yelled and huzzaed like mad. The maids popped their mob-caps out of the attics, and giggled and hung out at risk of their necks. The serving-men ran out on the hall door steps. The village roués emerged in haste from their public houses. The whole scene round and along, from top to bottom, was grinning and agape. Nature seemed to brighten up at sight of them ; and the sun, himself, came out all in his best, with an unparalleled effulgence.

Yes, the town was proud of its corps, and well it might. As gun after gun, with its complement of men and its Lieutenant Fire-workers, with a "right wheel," rolled out of the gate upon the broad street, not a soul could look upon the lengthening pageant of Blue and scarlet, with its symmetrical diagonals of snowy belt and long-flapped white cartouche boxes, moving together with measured swing, and all its buttons and brasses flashing up to the sun, without allowing it was a fine spirited sight.

And Lily, beholding the phantom regiment, with mournful eyes, played their grand sad march proudly as they passed.

And always there was one light, tall shape ; one dark handsome face, with darker, stranger eyes, and a nameless grace and interest moving with the march of the gay pageant, before her mind's eye, to this harmonious and regretful music, which, as she played on, and her reverie deepened, grew slower and more sad, till old Sally's voice awoke the dreamer. The chords ceased, the vision melted, and poor little Lily smiled sadly and kindly on old Sally, and took her candle, and went up with her to her bed.

---

CHAPTER LVII.

BEING A CHAPTER OF HOOPS, FEATHERS, AND BRILLIANTS, AND BUCKS AND FIDDLERS.

It was a mighty grand affair, this ball of the Royal Irish Artillery. General Chatterworth had arrived that morning, just in time to preside over the hospitalities; and his advent, still a little lame, but looking, as his friends told him, ten years younger for his snug little fit of the gout at Buxton, reinstated Aunt Becky in her place of power, to the secret disappointment of Madam Stafford, who had set her heart on doing the honours, and rehearsed for weeks, over her toilet, and even in bed, her little speeches, airs, and graces.

Lord Castlemallard was there, of course—and the gay and splendid Lady Moira—whom I mention because General Chatterworth opened the ball in a minnet with her ladyship—hobbling with wonderful grace, and beaming with great ceremonious smiles through his honourable martyrdom. And the Lord Lieutenant was very near coming—and a Lord Lieutenant in those days, with a Parliament to open, and all the regalia of his office about him, was a far greater personage than, in our democratic age, the Sovereign in person.

Captain Cluffe had gone down in a chair to Puddock's lodgings, to borrow a pair of magnificent knee-buckles. Puddock had a second pair, and Cluffe's own had not, he thought, quite recovered their good looks since that confounded ducking on the night of the serenade. The gallant Captain, learning that Puddock and Devereux intended walking—it was only a step across to the barrack-yard—and finding that Puddock could not at the moment lay his hand upon the buckles, and not wishing to keep the chair longer—for he knew delay would inflame the fare, and did not like dispensing his shillings—

"Hey! walk! I like the fancy," cried the gay Captain, sending half-a-crown down stairs to his "two-legged ponies," as people pleasantly called them. "I'd rather walk with you than jog along in a chair by myself, my gay fellows, any day."

Most young fellows of spirit, at the eve of a ball, have their heads pretty full. There is always some one bright particular star to whom, even as they look on their own handsome phizzes in the mirror, their adoration is paid.

Puddock's shoe-buckles flashed for Gertrude Chatterworth, as he turned out his toes. For her his cravat received its last careless touch—his ruffles shook themselves, and fell in rich elegance about his plump little hands. For her his diamond ring gleamed like a burning star from his white little-finger; and for her the last fragrance was thrown over his pocket-handkerchief, and the last ogle thrown upon his looking-glass. All the interest of his elaborate toilet—the whole solemn process and detail—was but a worship of his divinity, at which he officiated. Much in the same way was Cluffe affected over his bedizenment in relation to his own lady-love; but in a calmer and more longheaded fashion. Devereux's toilet most of the young fellows held to be perfection; yet it seemed to trouble him less than all the rest. I believe it was the elegant and slender shape that would have set off anything, and that gave to his handsome costume and "properties" an undefinable grace not their own. Indeed, as he leaned his elbow upon the window-sash, looking carelessly across the river, he did not seem much to care what became of the labours of his toilet.

"I have not seen her since I came; and now I'm going to this stupid ball on the chance of meeting her there. And she'll not come—she avoids me—the chance of meeting her—and she'll not come. Well! if she be not kind to me, what care I for whom she be? And what great matter, after all, if she were there? She'd be, I suppose, on her high horse—and—and 'tis not a feather to me. Let her take her own way. What care I? If she's happy, why shouldn't I—why shouldn't I?"

Five minutes after:

"Who the plague are these fellows in the Phoenix? How the brutes howl over their liquor!" said Devereux, as he and Puddock, at the door-steps, awaited Cluffe, who was fixing his buckles in the drawing-room.

"The Corporation of Tailors," answered Puddock, a little loftily, for he had notions about birth and gentle blood; and he was not inwardly pleased that the precincts of the "Phoenix" should be profaned by their mechanical orgies.

Through the open bow-window of the great oak parlour of the inn was heard the mighty voice of the President, who was now in the thick of his political toasts.

"May the friends of the Marquis of Kildare be ever blessed with the tailor's thimble," declaimed the portentous toast-master. "May the needle of distress be ever pointed at all mock patriots; and a hot needle and a burning thread to all sowers of sedition!" and then came an applauding roar.

"And may you ride into town on your own goose, with a hot needle behind you, you roaring pigmy!" added Devereux.

"The Irish cooks that can't relish French sauce!" enunciated the same grand voice, that floated, mellowed, over the field.

"Sauce, indeed!" said Puddock, with an indignant lisp, as Cluffe, having joined them, they set forward together; "I saw some of them going in, sir, and to look at their vulgar, unthinking countenances, you'd say they had not capacity to distinguish between the taste of a quail and a goose; but, by Jove! sir, they have a dinner. You're a politician, Cluffe, and read the papers. You remember the bill of fare—don't you?—at the Lord Mayor's entertainment in London."

Cluffe, whose mind was full of other matters, nodded his head with a grunt.

"Well, I'll take my oath," pursued Puddock, "you couldn't have made a better dinner at the Prince of Travendahl's table. Spanish olea, if you please—ragou royal, cardoons, tendrons, shell-fish in marinade, ruffs and recs, wheat-ears, green morels, fat livers, combs and notts. 'Tis rather odd, sir, to us who employ them, to learn that our tailors, while we're eating the dinners we do—our tailors, sir, are absolutely gorging themselves with such things—with our money, by Jove!"

"Yours, Puddock, not mine," said Devereux. "I haven't paid a tailor these six years. But, hang it, let's get on."

So, in they walked by the barrack-yard, lighted up now with a splendid red blaze of torches, and, with different emotions, entered the already crowded ball-room.

Devereux looked round the room, among nodding plumes and flashing brilliants, and smirking old bucks, and simpering young ones, amidst the buzz of two or three hundred voices, and the thunder and braying of the band. There were scores of pretty faces there, and more spirit and animation, and, I think, more grace too, in dance and talk, than the phlegmatic affectation of modern days allows; and there were some bright eyes that, not seeming to look, yet recognised, with a little thrill at the heart, and a brighter flush, the brilliant, proud Devereux, with his gipsy tint, and great enthusiastic eyes, and strange melancholy, subacid smile. But to him the room was lifeless, and the hour was dull, and the music but a noise and a jingle.

"I knew quite well she wasn't here, and she never cared for me, and I—why should I trouble my head about her? She makes her cold an excuse. Well, maybe yet she'll wish to see Dick Devereux, and I far away. No matter. They've heard slanders of me, and believe them. Amen, say I. If they're so light of faith, and false in friendship, to cast me off for a foul word or an idle story—curse it—I'm well rid of that false and foolish friendship, and can repay their coldness and aversion with a light heart, a bow, and a smile. One slander I'll refute—yes—and that done, I'll close this idle episode in my cursed epic, and never, never think of her again."

But fancy will not be controlled by resolutions, though ne'er so wise and strong, and precisely as the Captain vowed "never"—away glided that wild, sad sprite across the moonlit river, and among the old black elms, and stood unbidden beside Lillas. Little Lily, as they used to call her five years ago; and Devereux, who seemed to look so intently and so strangely on the flash and whirl of the dancers, saw but an old-fashioned drawing-room with roses clustering by the windows, and heard the sweet rich voice, to him the music of Ariel; and sometimes the old pleasant talk and merry little laugh, all old remembrances or vain dreams now.

But Devereux had business on his hands that night, and about eleven o'clock he had disappeared. 'Twas easy to go and come in such a crowd, and no one perceive it.

Puddock was very happy and excited. Mervyn, whom he had once feared, was there, a mere spectator, however, to witness that night's signal triumph. He had never danced so much with Miss Gertrude before, that is to say, at a great ball like this at which there was a plenty of bucks with good blood and lots of money; and indeed, it seemed to favour the idea of his success that Aunt Rebecca acknowledged him only with a silent and by no means gracious courtesy.

She was talking to Toole about Lillas, saying how much better she had looked that evening.

"She's not better, ma'am; I'd rather she hadn't the bright flush you speak of; there's something, you see, not quite right in that left lung, and that bright tint, madam, is hectic—she's not better, madam, not that we don't hope to see her so—Heaven forbid—but 'tis an anxious case;" and Toole shook his head gravely.

When Aunt Becky was getting on her hood and mantle, she invariably fell into talk with some crony who had a story to tell, or a point to discuss. So as she stood listening to old Colonel Bligh's hard, reedy gabble, and popping in her decisive word now and then, Gertrude equipped for the night air, and with little Puddock for her escort, glided out and took her place in the great state coach of the Chatterworths, and the door being shut, she made a little nod and a faint smile to her true knight, and said with the slightest possible shrug—

“How cold it is to-night; my Aunt, I think, will be obliged for your assistance, Lieutenant Puddock; as for me, I must shut up my window and wish you good-night.”

And with another smile she accordingly shut up the window, and when his best bow was accomplished, she leaned back with a pale and stricken countenance, and a great sigh—such a one as caused Lady Macbeth’s physician, long ago, to whisper, “What a sigh is there! the heart is sorely charged.” The footmen were standing by the open door, through which Aunt Becky was to come, and there were half a dozen carriages crowded side by side, the lackeys being congregated with links lighted about the same place of exit; and things being so, there came a small sharp tapping at the far window of the carriage, and with a start Gertrude saw the identical mantle, and the three-cocked-hat with the peculiar corners, which had caused certain observers so much speculation on another night, and drawing close to the window, whereat this apparition presented itself, she let it down.

“I know, beloved Gertrude, what you would say,” he softly said; “but be it frenzy or no, I cannot forbear; I am unalterable—be you the same.”

A white, slender hand glided in and seized hers, not resisting.

“Yes, Mordaunt, the same; but oh! how miserable!” said Gertrude, and with just the slightest movement in the fingers of her small hand, hardly perceptible, and yet how fond a caress!

“I’m like a man who has lost his way among the catacombs—among the dead,” whispered this shrouded figure, close to the window, still fervently holding her hand, “and see at last the distant light that shows him that his horrible wanderings are to end. Yes, Gertrude, my beloved—yes, Gertrude, idol of my solitary love—the mystery is about to end—I’ll end it. Be I what I may, you know the worst, and have given me your love and troth—you are my affianced bride; rather than lose you, I would die ; and I think, or I am walking in a dream, I've but to point my finger against two men, and all will be peace and light—light and peace—to me long strangers ! ”

At this moment Aunt Becky's voice was heard at the door, and the flash of the flambeaux glared on the window. He kissed the hand of the pale girl hurriedly, and the French cocked-hat and mantle vanished.

In came Aunt Rebecca in a fuss, and it must be said in no very gracious mood, and rather taciturn and sarcastic ; and so away they rumbled over the old bridge towards Belmont.

---

CHAPTER LVIII.

IN WHICH THE GHOSTS OF A BYE-GONE SIN KEEP TRYST.

DEVEREUX, wrapped in his cloak, strode into the Park, through Parson's gate, up the steep hill, and turned towards Castleknock and the furze and hawthorn wood that interposes. The wide plain spread before him in solitude, with the thin vapours of night lying over it like a film in the moonlight.

Two or three thorn trees stood out from the rest, a pale and solitary group, stooping eastward with the prevailing sweep of a hundred years or more of westerly winds. To this the gipsy captain glided, in a straight military line, his eyes searching the distance ; and, after a while, from the skirts of the wood, there moved to meet him a lonely female figure, with her light clothing fluttering in the cold air. At first she came hurriedly, but as they drew near she came more slowly.

Devereux was angry, and, like an angry man, he broke out first with—“ So, your servant, Mistress Nan ! Pretty lies you've been telling of me—you and your shrew of a mother. You thought you might go to the Rector and say what you pleased, and I hear nothing of it."

Nan Glynn was undefinably aware that he was very angry, and had hesitated and stood still before he began, and now she said imploringly—

"Sure, Masther Richard, it wasn't me."

"Come, my lady, don't tell me. You and your mother—curse her!—went to the Elms in my absence—you and she—and said I had promised to marry you? There—yes or no. Didn't you? And could you, or could she, have uttered a more damnable lie?"

"'Twas she, Masther Richard—troth an' faith, I never knew she was going to say the like—no more I didn't."

"A likely story, truly, Miss Nan!" said the young rake, bitterly.

"Oh! Masther Richard! by this cross!—you won't believe me—'tis as true as you're standin' there—until she said it to Miss Lily"—

"Hold your tongue!" cried Devereux, so fiercely that she thought him half wild; "do you think 'tis a pin's point to me which of you first coined or uttered that most infernal falsehood. Listen to me: I'm a desperate man, and I'll take a course with you both you'll not like, unless you go to-morrow and see Dr. Walsingham yourself, and tell him the whole truth—yes, the truth—what the devil do I care—speak that, and make the most of it. But tell him plainly that your story about my having promised to marry you—do you hear—was a lie, from first to last—a lie—a lie—without so much as a grain of truth mixed up in it. Now, mind ye, Miss Nan, if you don't, I'll bring you and your mother into court, or I'll have the truth out of you."

"But there's no need to threaten; sure you know, Masther Richard, I'd do anything for you—I would. I'd beg, or I'd rob, or I'd die for you, Masther Richard; and whatever you bid me, your poor wild Nan 'll do."

Devereux was touched; the tears were streaming down her pale cheeks, and she was shivering.

"You're cold, Nan; where's your cloak and riding hood?" he said, gently.

"I had to part them, Masther Richard."

"You want money, Nan," he said, and his heart smote him.

"I'm not cold when I'm near you, Masther Richard. I'd wait the whole night long for a chance of seeing you; but oh! ho—[she was crying as if her heart would break, looking in his face, and with her hands just a little stretched towards him] oh, Masther Richard, I'm nothing to you now—your poor wild Nan!"

Poor thing! Her mother had not given her the best education. I believe she was a bit of a thief, and she could tell fibs with fluency and precision. The woman was a sinner; but her wild, strong affections were true, and her heart was not in pelf.

"Now, don't cry—where's the good of crying—listen to me," said Devereux.

"Sure I heerd you were sick last week, Masther Richard," she went on, not heeding, and with her cold fingers just touching his arm timidly—and the moon glittered on the tears that streamed down her poor imploring cheeks—"an' I'd like to be caring you; an' I think you look bad, Masther Richard."

"No, Nan—I tell you, no—I'm very well, only poor, just now, Nan, or you should not want."

"Sure I know, Masther Richard: it is not that. I know you'd be good to me if you had it; and it does not trouble me."

"But see, Nan, you must speak to your friends, and say"—

"Sorra a friend I have—sorra a friend, Masther Richard; and I did not spake to the priest this year or more, and I darn't go near him," said the poor Palmerstown lass that was once so merry.

"Why won't you listen to me, child; I won't have you this way. You must have your cloak and hood. 'Tis very cold; and, by heavens, Nan, you shall never want while I have a guinea. But you see I'm poor now, curse it—I'm poor—I'm sorry, Nan, and I have only this one about me."

"Oh, no, Masther Richard, keep it—maybe you'd want it yourself."

"No, child, don't vex me—there—I'll have money in a week or two, and I'll send you some more, Nan—I'll not forget you." He said this in a sadder tone; "and, Nan, I'm a changed man. All's over, you know, and we'll see one another no more. You'll be happier, Nan, for the parting; so here, and now, Nan, we'll say good-bye."

"An' oh, Masther Richard, is it in airnest? You wouldn't, oh! sure you wouldn't."

"Now, Nan, there's a good girl; I must go. Remember your promise, and I'll not forget you, Nan—on my soul, I won't."

"Well, well, mayn't I chance to see you, maybe; mayn't I look at you marching, Masther Richard, at a distance only? I wouldn't care so much, I think, if I could see you sometimes."

"Now, there, Nan, you must not cry; you know 'tis all past and gone, more than a year ago. 'Twas all d—d folly—all my fault; I'm sorry Nan—I'm sorry; and I'm a changed man, and I'll lead a better life, and so do you, my poor girl."

"But mayn't I see you? I'm not askin' to spake to you, Master Richard; this is the last time; I know, 'tis only right. Only sometimes to see you, far off, maybe." Poor Nan was crying all the time she spoke;—"Well, well, I'll go, I will, indeed, Masther Richard; only let me kiss your hand—an' oh! no, no, don't say good-bye, and I'll go—I'm gone now, an' may be—just maybe, you might some time chance to wish to see your poor, wild Nan again—only to see her, an' I'll be thinkin' o' that."

He saw her, poor creature, hurrying away in her light clothing, through the sharp, moonlight chill, which, even in the wrapping of his thick cloak, he felt keenly enough. She looked over her shoulder—then stopped; perhaps, poor thing, she thought he was relenting, and then she began to hurry back again. They cling so desperately to the last chance. But that, you know, would never do. Another pleading—another parting—so he turned sharply and strode into the thickets of the close brushwood, among which the white mists of night were hanging. He thought, as he stepped resolutely and quickly on, with a stern face, and heavy heart, that he heard a wild sobbing cry in the distance, and that was poor Nan's farewell.

So Devereux glided on like a ghost, through the noiseless thicket, and scarcely knowing or caring where he went, emerged upon the broad open plateau, and skirting the Fifteen Acres, came, at last, to a halt upon the high ground overlooking the river—which ran, partly in long trains of silver sparkles, and partly in deep blue shadow beneath him. Here he stopped, and looked towards the village where he had passed many a pleasant hour—with a profound and remorseful foreboding that there were no more such pleasant hours for him; and his eye wandered among the scattered lights that still twinkled from the distant windows; and he fancied he knew, among them all, that which gleamed pale and dim through the distant elms; and he looked at it across the water—a greater gulf severed them—so near, and yet a star in distance—with a strange mixture of sadness and defiance, tenderness and fury.

---

CHAPTER LIX.

OF A SOLEMN RESOLUTION WHICH CAPTAIN DEVEREUX REGISTERED AMONG HIS HOUSEHOLD GODS, WITH A LIBATION.

WHEN Devereux entered his drawing-room, and lighted his candles, he was in a black and bitter mood. He stood at the window for a while, and drummed on the pane, looking in the direction of the barrack, where all the fun was going on, but thinking, in a chaotic way, of things very different, and all toned with that strange sense of self-reproach and foreboding, which, of late, had grown habitual with him.

"This shall be the last. 'Twas dreadful, seeing that poor Nan; and I want it—I can swear, I really and honestly want it—only one glass to stay my heart. Every one may drink in moderation—especially if he's heartsick, and has no other comfort—one glass and no more—curse it."

So one glass of brandy—I'm sorry to say, unmixed with water—the handsome misanthropist sipped and sipped to the last drop; and then sat down before his fire, and struck, and poked, and stabbed at it in a bitter, personal sort of way, until here and there some blazes leaped up, and gave his eyes a dreamy sort of occupation; and he sat back, with his hands in his pockets, and his feet on the fender, gazing upon the Plutonic peaks and caverns between the bars.

"I've had my allowance for to-night; to-morrow night, none at all. 'Tis an accursed habit; and I'll not allow it to creep upon me. No, I've never fought it fairly, as I mean to do now—'tis quite easy, if one has the will to do it."

So he sat before his fire, chewing the cud of bitter fancy only; and he recollected he had not quite filled his glass, and up he got with a swagger, and says he—

"We'll drink fair, if you please—one glass—one only—but that, hang it—a bumper."

So he made a rough calculation.

"We'll say so much—here or there, 'tis no great matter. A thimbleful won't drown me. Pshaw! that's too much. What am I to do with it?—hang it. Well, we can't help it—'tis the last."

So whatever the quantity may have been, he drank it too, and grew more moody; and was suddenly called up from the black abyss by the entrance of little Puddock, rosy and triumphant, from the ball.

"Ha! Puddock! Then, the fun's over. I'm glad to see you. I've been tête-à-tête with my shadow—cursed bad company, Puddock. Where's Cluffe?"

"Gone home, I believe."

"So much the better. You know Cluffe better than I, and there's a secret about him I never could find out. You have, maybe?"

"What's that?" lisped Puddock.

"Why, 'tis what the deuce Cluffe's good for."

"Oh! tut! We all know Cluffe's a very good fellow."

Devereux looked from under his finely-pencilled brows with a sad sort of smile at good little Puddock.

"I wish I were like you, Puddock. We've the knowledge of good and evil between us. The knowledge of good is all yours: you see nothing but the good that men have; you see it—and, I daresay truly—where I can't. The darker knowledge is mine."

Puddock, who thought he thoroughly understood King John, Shylock, and Richard III., was a good deal taken aback by Devereux's estimate of his penetration.

"Well, I don't think you know me, Devereux," resumed he, with a thoughtful lisp. "I'm much mistaken, or I could sound the depths of a villain's soul as well as most men."

"And if you did you'd find it full of noble qualities," said Dick Devereux. "What book is that?"

"The tragical history of Dr. Faustus," answered Puddock. "I left it here more than a week ago. Have you read it?"

"Faith, Puddock, I forgot it! Let's see what 'tis like," said Devereux. "Heyday!" And he read—

"Now, Faustus, let thine eyes with horror stare
Into that vast perpetual torture-house;
There are the Furies tossing damned souls
On burning forks; there bodies boil in lead;
There are live quarters broiling on the coals
That ne'er can die; this ever-burning chair

Is for o'er-tortured souls to rest them in;
 These that are fed with sops of flaming fire
 Were gluttons, and loved only delicacies,
 And laughed to see the poor starving at their gates."

"Tailors! by Jupiter! Serve 'em right, the rogues. Tailors dining upon ragou royal, Spanish olea, Puddock—fat livers, and green morels in the Phoenix, the scoundrels, and laughing to see poor gentlemen of the Royal Irish Artillery starving at their gates—hang 'em."

"Well! well! Listen to the Good Angel," said Puddock, taking up the book and declaiming his best—

"O thou hast lost celestial happiness,
 Pleasures unspeakable, bliss without end,
 Hadst thou affected sweet divinity,
 Hell or the devil had no power on thee—
 Hadst thou kept on that way. Faustus, behold
 In what resplendent glory thou hadst sat,
 On yonder throne, like those bright shining spirits,
 And triumphed over hell! That hast thou lost;
 And now, poor soul, must thy good angel leave thee;
 The jaws of hell are open to receive thee."

"Stop that; 'tis all cursed rant," said Devereux. "That is, the thing itself; you make the most of it."

"Why, truly," said Puddock, "there are better speeches in it. But 'tis very late; and parade, you know—I shall go to bed. And you——"

"No. I shall stay where I am."

"Well, I wish you good-night, dear Devereux."

"Good-night, Puddock."

And the plump little fellow was heard skipping down stairs, and the hall-door shut behind him. Devereux took the play that Puddock had just laid down, and read for a while with a dreary kind of interest. Then he got up, and I'm sorry to say, drank another glass of the same strong waters.

"To-morrow I turn over a new leaf;" and he caught himself repeating Puddock's snatch of Macbeth, "To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow."

Devereux looked out, leaning on the window-sash. All was quiet now, as if the rattle of a carriage had never disturbed the serene cold night. The town had gone to bed, and you could hear the sigh of the river across the field. A sadder face the moon did not shine upon.

After a while, Devereux returned to his chair before the fire, and on his way again drank of the waters of Lethe, and sat down, not forgetting, but remorseful, over the fire.

"I'll drink no more to-night—there—curse me if I do."

The fire was waxing low in the grate. "To-morrow's a new day. Why, I never made a resolution about it before. I can keep it. 'Tis easily kept. To-morrow I begin."

And with fists clenched in his pockets, he vowed his vow, with an oath, into the fire; and ten minutes were not past and over, when his eye wandered thirstily again to the flask on the middle of the table, and with a sardonic, flushed smile, he quoted the "Good Angel's" words:—

"Oh, Faustus, lay that damned book aside,
And gaze not on it lest it tempt thy soul."

And then pouring out a dram, he looked on it lovingly, and says he, with the "Evil Angel"—

"Go forward, Faustus, in that famous art,
Wherein all Nature's treasure is contained:
Be thou on earth, as Jove is in the sky,
Lord and commander of the elements."

And then, with a solitary sneer, he sipped it. And after a while he drank one glass more, and shoved it back, with—

"There; that's the last."

And then, perhaps, there was one other "last;" and after that "the very last." Hang it! it must be the last, and so on, I suppose. And Devereux was pale, and looked wild and sulky on parade next morning.

CHAPTER LX.

IN WHICH A LIBERTY IS TAKEN WITH MR. NUTTER'S NAME,
AND MR. DANGERFIELD STANDS AT THE ALTAR.

POOR Mrs. Nutter continued in a state of distracted and flighty tribulation, not knowing what to make of it, nor, indeed, knowing the worst; for the neighbours did not tell her half they might, nor drop a hint of the dreadful suspicion that dogged her absent helpmate.

Father Roach, a good-natured apostle, whose digestion suffered when any one he liked was in trouble, paid her a visit; and being somehow confounded with Dr. Toole, was shown up to her bed-room, where the poor little woman lay crying under the coverlet. On discovering where he was, the good father was disposed to flinch, and get down stairs, in tenderness to his "character," and thinking what a story "them villians o' the world 'id make iv it down at the club there." But on second thoughts, poor little Sally being neither young nor comely, he ventured, and sat down by the bed, veiled behind a strip of curtain, and poured his mellifluous consolations into her open ears.

And poor Sally became eloquent in return. And Father Roach dried his eyes, although she could not see him behind the curtain, and called her "my daughter," and "dear lady," and tendered such comforts as his housekeeping afforded. "Had she bacon in the house?" or "maybe she'd like a fat fowl?" "She could not eat!" "Why then she could make elegant broth of it, and dhrink it, an' he'd keep another fat-tenin' until Nutter himself come back."

"And then, my honey, you an' himself 'ill come down and dine wid ould Father Austin; an' we'll have a grand evenin' of it entirely, laughin' over the remimbrance iv these black-guard troubles, acuishla! Or maybe you'd accept iv a couple o' bottles of claret or canaries! I see—you don't want for wine."

So there was just one more offer the honest fellow had to make, and he opened with assurances 'twas only between himself an' her—an' not a sowl on airth 'id ever hear a word about it—and he asked her pardon, but he thought she might chance to want a guinea or two, just till Nutter came back, and he brought a couple in his waistcoat pocket.

Poor Father Roach was hard-up just then. Indeed, the being "hard-up" was a chronic affection with him. Two horses were not to be kept for nothing. Nor for the same moderate figure was it possible to maintain an asylum for unfortunates and outlaws—pleasant fellows enough, but endowed with great appetites and an unquenchable taste for consolation in fluid forms.

A clerical provision in Father Roach's day, and church, was not by any means what we have seen it since. At all events, he was not often troubled with the possession of money, and when half-a-dozen good weddings brought him in fifty or a hundred pounds, the holy man was constrained forthwith to make distribution of his assets among a score of sour, and sometimes dangerous, tradespeople. I mention this in no disparagement of Father Roach, quite the contrary. In making the tender of his two guineas—which, however, Sally declined—the worthy cleric was offering the widow's mite; not like some lucky dogs who might throw away a thousand or two and be nothing the worse; and you may be sure the poor fellow was very glad to find she did not want it.

"Rather hard measure, it strikes me," said Dangerfield, in the club, to put him in the Hue-and-Cry."

But there he was, sure enough, "Charles Nutter, Esq., formerly of the Mills, near Knockmaroon, in the county of Dublin;" and a full description of the dress he wore, as well as of his height, complexion, features—and all this his poor little wife, still inhabiting the Mills, and quite unconscious that any man, woman, or child, who could prosecute him to conviction, for a murderous assault on Dr. Sturk, should have £50 reward.

"News in to-day, by Jove," said Toole, bustling solemnly into the club; "by the packet that arrived at one o'clock, a man taken, answering Nutter's description exactly, just going aboard of a Jamaica brig at Gravesend, and giving no account of himself; he's to be sent over to Dublin for identification."

And when that was thoroughly discussed two or three times over, they fell to talking of other subjects, and among the rest of Devereux, and wondered what his plans were; and there being no brother officers by, whether he meant to keep his commission, and various speculations as to the exact cause of the coldness shown him by General Chatterworth. Dick Spaight thought it might be that he had not asked Miss Gertrude in marriage.

But this was pooh-poohed. "Besides, they knew at Belmont," said Toole, who was an authority upon the domestic politics of that family, and rather proud of being so, "just as well as I did, that Gipsy Dick was in love with Miss Lilius; and I lay you fifty le'd marry her to-morrow if she'd have him."

Toole was always a little bit more intimate with people behind their backs, so he called Devereux "Gipsy Dick."

"She's ailing, I hear," said old Slowe.

"She is, indeed, sir," answered the Doctor, with a grave shake of the head.

"Nothing of moment, I hope!" he asked.

"Why, you see it may be; she had a bad cough last winter, and this year she took it earlier, and it has fallen very much on her lungs; and you see, we can't say, sir, what turn it may take, and I'm very sorry she should be so sick and ailing. But I trust, sir, with care, you know, 'twill turn out well."

The season for trout-fishing was long past and gone, and there were no more pleasant rambles for Dangerfield and Irons along the flowery banks of the devious Liffey. Their rods and nets hung up, awaiting the return of genial spring; and the churlish stream, abandoned to its wintry mood, darkled and roared savagely under the windows of the Brass Castle.

One dismal morning, as Dangerfield's energetic step carried him briskly through the town, the iron gate of the church-yard, and the door of the church itself standing open, he turned in, glancing upward as he passed at Sturk's bed-room windows, as all the neighbours did, to see whether General Death's white banners were floating there, and his tedious siege ended.

Up the aisle marched Dangerfield, not abating his pace, but with a swift and bracing clatter, like a man taking a frosty constitutional walk.

Irons was moping softly about in the neighbourhood of the reading-desk, and about to mark the places of psalms and chapters in the great church Bible and Prayer-book, and sidelong he beheld his crony of the angle marching, with a grim confidence and swiftness, up the aisle.

"I say, where's Martin?" said Dangerfield, cheerfully.

"He's gone away, sir."

"Hey! then you've no one with you?"

"No, sir."

Dangerfield walked straight on, up to the step of the communion-table, and shoving open the little balustrade door, he made a gay stride or two across the holy precinct, and with a quick right-about face, came to a halt. The white, scoffing face, for exercise never flushed it, and the cold, broad sheen of the spectacles, looked odd in the clerk's eyes facing the church-door, from beside the table of the sacrament, displayed, as it were, in the very frame—foreground, background, and all—in which he was wont to behold the thoughtful, simple, holy face of the Rector.

"Alone among the dead! and not afraid!" croaked the white face pleasantly.

The clerk seemed always to writhe and sweat silently under the banter of his comrade of the landing-net, and he answered, without lifting his head, in a constrained and dogged sort of way, like a man who expects something unpleasant—

"Alone? yes, sir, there's none here but ourselves."

And his face flushed, and the veins on his forehead stood out, as will happen with a man who tugs at a weight that is too much for him.

"I saw you steal a glance at Charles when he came into the church here, and it strikes me, I was at the moment thinking of the same thing as you, to wit, will he require any special service at our hands? Well, he does! and you or I must do it. He'll give a thousand pounds, mind ye; and that's something in the way of fellows like you and me; and whatever else he may have done, Charles has never broke his word in a money matter. And hark'ee, can't you thumb over that Bible and Prayer-book on the table here as well as there? Do so. Well——"

And he went on in a lower key, still looking full front at the church-door, and a quick glance now and then upon Irons, across the communion-table.

"'Tis nothing at all—don't you see—what are you afraid of? It can't change events—'tis only a question of to-day or to-morrow—a whim—a maggot—hey! You can manage it this way, mark ye."

He had his pocket-handkerchief by the two corners before him, like an apron, and he folded it neatly and quickly into four.

"Don't you see—and a little water. You're a neat hand, you know; and if you're interrupted, 'tis only to blow your nose in't—ha, ha, ha!—and clap it in your pocket; and you may as well have the money—hey! Good-morning."

And when he had got half-way down the aisle, he called back to Irons, in a loud, frank voice—

"And Martin's not here—could you say where he is?"

But he did not await the answer, and glided with quick steps from the porch, with a side leer over the wavy green mounds and tombstones. He had not been three minutes in the church, and across the street he went, to the shop over the way, and asked briskly where Martin, the sexton, was. Well, they did not know.

"Ho! Martin," he cried across the street, seeing that functionary just about to turn the corner by Sturk's hall-door steps; "a word with you. I've been looking for you. See, you must take a foot-rule, and make all the measurements of that pew, you know; don't mistake a hair's breadth, d'ye mind, for you must be ready to swear to it; and bring a note of it to me, at home, to-day, at one o'clock, and you shall have a crown piece."

From which the reader will perceive—as all the world might, if they had happened to see him enter the church just now—that his object in the visit was to see and speak with Martin; and that the little bit of banter with Irons, the clerk, was all by-play, and parenthesis, and beside the main business, and, of course, of no sort of consequence.

Mr. Irons, like most men of his rank in life, was not much in the habit of exact thinking. His ruminations, therefore, were rather confused, but, perhaps, they might be translated in substance, into something like this—

"Why, the —— can't he let them alone that's willing to let him alone; I wish he was in his own fiery home, and better people at rest. I can't mark them places—I don't know whether I'm on my head or heels."

And he smacked the quarto Prayer-book down upon the folio Bible with a sonorous bang, and glided out, furious, frightened, and taciturn, to the Salmon House.

He came upon Dangerfield again only half-a-dozen steps from the turn into the street. He had just dismissed Martin, and was looking into a note in his pocket-book, and either did not see, or pretended not to see, the clerk. But some one else saw and recognised Mr. Irons; and, as he passed, directed upon him a quick, searching glance. It was Mr. Mervyn, who happened to pass that way. Irons, and Dangerfield, and the churchyard—there was a flash of association in the group and the background which accorded with an old suspicion. Dangerfield, indeed, was innocently reading a leaf in his red and gilt leather pocket-book, as I have said. But Irons' eyes met the glance of Mervyn, and contracted oddly, and altogether there gleamed out something indefinable in his look. It was only for a second—a glance of intuition; and from that moment it was one of Mervyn's immovable convictions, that Mr. Dangerfield knew something of Irons' secret. It was a sort of intermittent suspicion before—now it was a monstrous, but fixed belief.

---

CHAPTER LXI.

BEING A NIGHT SCENE, IN WHICH MISS GERTRUDE CHATTESWORTH, BEING ADJURED BY AUNT BECKY, MAKES ANSWER.

IN Aunt Becky's mind, the time could not be far off when the odd sort of relation existing between the Belmont family and Mr. Dangerfield must be defined. The Croesus himself, indeed, was very indulgent. He was assiduous and respectful; but he wisely abstained from pressing for an immediate decision, and trusted to reflection and to Aunt Becky's good offices; and knew that his gold would operate by its own slow, but sure, gravitation.

At one time he had made up his mind to be peremptory—and politely to demand an unequivocal "yes," or "no." But a letter reached him from London; it was from a great physician there. Whatever was in it, the effect was to relieve his mind of an anxiety. He never, indeed, looked anxious, or moped like an ordinary man in blue-devils. But his servants knew when anything weighed upon his spirits, by his fierce, short, maniacal temper. But with the seal of that letter the spell broke, the evil spirit departed for a while, and the old jocose, laconic irony came back, and glittered whitely in the tall chair by the fire, and sipped its claret after dinner, and sometimes smoked its long pipe and grinned into the embers of the grate. At Belmont there had been a skirmish over the broiled drumsticks at supper, and the ladies had withdrawn in towering passions to their nightly devotions and repose.

Gertrude had, of late, grown more like herself, but was quite resolute against the Dangerfield alliance, which Aunt Becky fought for the more desperately, that in their private confidences under the poplar trees she had given the rich cynic of the silver spectacles good assurance of success.

Puddock drank tea at Belmont—nectar in Olympus—that evening. Was ever Lieutenant so devoutly romantic? He had grown more fanatical and abject in his worship. He spoke less, and lisped in very low tones. He sighed often, and sometimes mightily; and ogled unhappily, and smiled lackadaisically. The beautiful damsel was, in her high, cold way, kind to the guest, and employed him about the room on little commissions, and listened to his speeches without hearing them, and rewarded them now and then with the gleam of a smile, which made his gallant little heart flutter up to his solitaire, and his honest powdered head giddy.

"I marvel, brother," ejaculated Aunt Becky, suddenly appearing in the parlour; where the General had made himself comfortable over his novel, and opening her address with a smart stamp on the floor: The veteran's heart made a little jump, and he looked up over his gold spectacles.

"I marvel, brother, what you can mean, desire, or intend, by all this ogling, sighing, and love-making; 'tis surely a strange way of forwarding Mr. Dangerfield's affair."

"Who—I? What ogling, sister Becky?"

"You! tut! That foolish, ungrateful person, Lieutenant Puddock; what can you propose to yourself, brother, in bringing Lieutenant Puddock here? I hate him."

"Why, what about Puddock—what has he done?" asks the General, with round eyes still, and closing his book on his finger.

"What has he done! Why, he's at your daughter's feet," cried Aunt Becky, with scarlet cheeks and flashing eyes; "and she—artful gipsy—has brought him there by positively making love to him.”

“Sweet upon Toodie (the General’s old pet name for Gertrude); why, half the young fellows are—you know—pooh, pooh,” and the General stood up with his back to the fire—looking uneasy; for, like many other men, he thought a woman’s eyes saw further in such a case than his.

“Do you wish the young huzzy—do you—to marry Lieutenant Puddock? I should not wonder! Why, of course, her fortune you and she may give away to whom you like; but remember, she’s young, and has been much admired, brother; and may make a great match; and in our day, young ladies were under direction, and did not marry without apprising their parents or natural guardians. Here’s Mr. Dangerfield, who proposes great settlements. Why won’t she have him? For my part, I think we’re little better than cheats; and I mean to write to-morrow morning and tell the poor gentleman that you and I have been bamboozling him to a purpose, and meant all along to marry the vixen to a poor lieutenant in your corps. Speak truth, and shame the devil, brother; for my part I’m sick of the affair; I’m sick of deception, ingratitude, and odious fools.”

Aunt Becky had vanished in a little whirlwind, leaving the General with his back to the fire, looking blank and uncomfortable. And from his little silver tankard he poured out a glassful of his mulled claret, not thinking, and smelled to it deliberately, as he used to do when he was tasting a new wine, and looked through it, and set the glass down, forgetting he was to drink it, for his thoughts were elsewhere.

On reaching her bed-room, which she did with impetuous haste, Aunt Becky shut the door with a passionate slam, and said, with a sort of choak and sob, “There’s nought but ingratitude on earth—the odious, odious, odious person!”

And when, ten minutes after, her maid came in, she found Aunt Rebecca but little advanced in her preparations for bed; and her summons at the door was answered by a fierce and shrilly nose-trumpeting, and a stern "Come in, huzzy—are you deaf, child?" And when she came in, Aunt Becky was grim, and fussy, and her eyes red.

Miss Gertrude was that night arrived just on that dim and delicious plateau—that debatable land upon which the last waking reverie and the first dream of slumber mingle together in airy dance and shifting colours—when, on a sudden, she was recalled to consciousness of her grave bed-posts, and damask curtains, by the voice of her aunt.

Sitting up, she gazed on the redoubted Aunt Becky through the lace of her bonnet de nuit, for some seconds, in a mystified and incredulous way.

Mistress Rebecca Chatterworth, on the other hand, had drawn the curtains, and stood, candle in hand, arrayed in her night-dress, like a ghost, only she had on a pink and green quilted dressing-gown loosely over it.

She was tall and erect, of course; but she looked softened and strange; and when she spoke, it was in quite a gentle, humble sort of way, which was perfectly strange to her niece.

"Don't be frightened, sweetheart," said she, and she leaned over, and with her arm round her neck, kissed her. "I came to say a word, and just to ask you a question. I wish, indeed I do—heaven knows—to do my duty; and, my dear child, will you tell me the whole truth—will you tell me truly?—You will, when I ask it as a kindness."

There was a little pause, and Gertrude looked with a pale gaze upon her aunt.

"Are you," said Aunt Becky—"do you, Gertrude—do you like Lieutenant Puddock?"

"Lieutenant Puddock!" repeated the girl, with the look and gesture of a person in whose ear something strange has buzzed.

"Because, if you really are in love with him, Gertie; and that he likes you; and that, in short"—Aunt Becky was speaking very rapidly, but stopped suddenly.

"In love with Lieutenant Puddock!" was all that Miss Gertrude said.

"Now, do tell me, Gertrude, if it be so—tell me, dear love. I know 'tis a hard thing to say," and Aunt Becky considerably began to fiddle with the ribbon at the back of her niece's night-cap, so that she need not look in her face; "but, Gertie, tell me truly, do you like him; and—and—why, if it be so, I will mention Mr. Dangerfield's suit no more. There now—there's all I want to say."

"Lieutenant Puddock!" repeats young madam in the night-cap; and by this time the film of slumber was gone; and the suspicion struck her somehow in altogether so comical a way that she could not help laughing in her aunt's sad, earnest face.

"Fat, funny little Lieutenant Puddock!—was ever so diverting a disgrace? Oh! dear aunt, what have I done to deserve so prodigious a suspicion?"

"Well! I'll tell you what you have done," said Aunt Becky, almost fiercely. "As absurd as he is, you have been twice as sweet upon him as he upon you; and you have done your endeavour to fill his brain with the notion that you are in love with him, young lady; and if you're not, you have acted, I promise you, a most unscrupulous and unpardonable part by a most honourable and well-bred gentleman—for that character I believe he bears. Yes—you may laugh, madam, how you please; but he's allowed, I say, to be as honest, as true, as fine a gentleman as—as"——

"As ever surprised a weaver," said the young lady, silyly, and laughing till she almost cried. In fact, she was showing in a new light, and becoming quite a funny character upon this theme. And, indeed, this sort of convulsion of laughing seemed so unaccountable on natural grounds to Aunt Rebecca, that her irritation subsided into perplexity, and she began to suspect that her extravagant merriment might mean possibly something which she did not quite understand.

"Well, niece, when you have quite done laughing at nothing, you will, perhaps, be so good as to hear me. I put it to you now, young lady, as your relation and your friend, once for all, upon your sacred honour—remember you're a Chatterworth—upon the honour of a Chatterworth" (a favourite family form of adjuration on serious occasions with Aunt Rebecca), "do you like Lieutenant Puddock?"

It was now Miss Gertrude's turn to be nettled, and to remind her visitor, by a sudden flush in her cheek and a flash from her eyes, that she was, indeed, a Chatterworth; and with more disdain than, perhaps, was quite called for, she repelled the soft suspicion.

"I protest, madam," said Miss Gertrude, "'tis too bad. Truly, madam, it is vastly vexations to have to answer so strange and affronting a question. If you ever took the trouble, aunt, to listen to, or look at, Lieutenant Puddock, you might——"

"Well, niece," quoth Aunt Becky, interrupting, with a little toss of her head, "young ladies weren't quite so hard to please in my time, and I can't see or hear that he's so much worse than others."

"I'd sooner die than have him," said Miss Gertie, peremptorily.

"Then, I suppose, if ever, and whenever he asks you the question himself, you'll have no hesitation in telling him so?" said Aunt Becky, with becoming solemnity.

"Laughable, ridiculous, comical, and absurd, as I always thought and believed Lieutenant Puddock to be, I yet believe the asking such a question of me to be a stretch of absurdity, from which his breeding, for he is a gentleman, will restrain him. Besides, madam, you can't possibly be aware of the subjects on which he has invariably discoursed whenever he happened to sit by me—plays and players, and candied fruit. Really, madam, it is too absurd to have to enter upon one's defence against so incredible an imagination."

Aunt Rebecca looked steadily for a few seconds in her niece's face, then drew a long breath, and leaning over, kissed her again on the forehead, and with a grave little nod, and looking on her again for a short space, without saying a word more, she turned suddenly and left the room.

---

CHAPTER LXII.

RELATING SOME AWFUL NEWS THAT REACHED THE VILLAGE,
'AND HOW DR. WALSHINGHAM VISITED CAPTAIN RICHARD DEVEREUX AT HIS LODGINGS.

AND now there was news all over the town, to keep all the tongues there in action.

News—news—great news!—terrible news! Peter Fogarty, Mr. Tresham's boy, had it that morning from his cousin, Jim Redmond, whose aunt lived at Ringsend, and kept the little shop over against the "Plume of Feathers," where you might have your pick and choice of all sorts of nice and useful things—bacon, brass snuff-boxes, penny ballads, eggs, candles, cheese, tobacco-pipes, pinchbeck buckles for knee and instep, soap, sausages, and who knows what besides.

No one quite believed it—it was a tradition at third-hand, and Peter Fogarty's cousin, Jim Redmond's aunt, was easy of faith;—Jim, it was presumed, not very accurate in narration, and Peter not much better. Though, however, it was not actually "intelligence," it was a startling thesis. And though some raised their brows and smiled, and shook their heads, the whole town certainly pricked their ears at it. And not a man met another without a "Well! anything more? You've heard the report, sir—eh?"

It was not till Doctor Toole came out of town, early that day, that the sensation began in earnest.

"There could be no doubt about it—'twas a wonderful strange thing certainly. After so long a time—and so well preserved too.”

“What was it—what is it?”

“Why, Charles Nutter’s corpse is found, sir?”

“Corpse—hey!”

“So Toole says. Holo! Toole—Doctor Toole—I say. Here’s Mr. Slowe hasn’t heard about poor Nutter.”

“Ho! neighbour Slowe—give you good-day, sir—not heard it? By Jove, sir—poor Nutter!—’tis true—his body’s found—picked up this morning, just at sunrise, by two Dunleary fishermen, off Bullock. Justice Lowe has seen it—and Spaight saw it too. I’ve just been speaking with him, not an hour ago, in Thomas-street. It lies at Ringsend—and an inquest in the morning.”

And so on in Doctor Toole’s manner, until he saw Dr. Walsingham, the good Rector, pausing in his leisurely walk just outside the row of houses that fronted the turnpike, in one of which were the lodgings of Dick Devereux.

The good Doctor Toole wondered what brought his reverence there, for he had an inkling of something going on. So he hustled off to him, and told his story with the stern solemnity befitting such a theme, and that pallid half-suppressed smile with which an exciting horror is sometimes related. And the good Rector had many ejaculations of consternation and sympathy, and not a few inquiries to utter. And at last, when the theme was quite exhausted, he told Toole, who still lingered on, that he was going to pay his respects to Captain Devereux.

“Oh!” says cunning little Toole, “you need not, for I told him the whole matter.”

“Very like, sir,” answered the Doctor; “but ’tis on another matter I wish to see him.”

“Oh!—ho!—certainly—very good, sir. I beg pardon—and—and—he’s just done his breakfast—a late dog, sir—ha! ha! Your servant, Doctor Walsingham.”

Devereux puzzled his comrade Puddock more than ever. Sometimes he would descend with his blue devils into the abyss, and sit there all the evening in a dismal sulk. Sometimes he was gayer even than his old gay self; and sometimes in a bitter vein, talking enigmatical ironies, with his strange smile; and sometimes he was dangerous and furious, just as the weather changes, without rhyme or reason. Maybe he was angry with himself, and thought it was with others; and was proud, sorry, and defiant, and let his moods, one after another, possess him as they came.

Of course Dick Devereux was now no visitor at the Elms. All that for the present was over. Neither did he see Lilas; for little Lily was now a close prisoner with doctors, in full uniform, with shouldered canes, mounting guard at the doors. 'Twas a hard winter, and she needed care and nursing. And Devereux chafed and fretted; and, in truth, 'twas hard to bear this spite of fortune—to be so near, and yet so far—quite out of sight and hearing.

A word or two from General Chatterworth in Doctor Walsingham's ear, as they walked to and fro before the white front of Belmont, had decided the Rector on making this little call; for he had now mounted the stair of Devereux's lodging, and standing on the carpet outside, knocked, with a grave, sad face, on his door panel, glancing absently through the lobby window, and whistling inaudibly the while.

On due invitation from within, the good parson entered, and the handsome Captain in all his splendours—this handsome slender fellow, with his dark face and large, unfathomable violet eyes, so wild and wicked, and yet so soft, stood up surprised, with a look of welcome, quickly clouded and crossed by a gleam of defiance.

They bowed, and shook hands, however, and bowed again, and each was the other's "servant;" and being seated, they talked de generalibus; for the good parson would not come like an executioner and take his prisoner by the throat, but altogether in the spirit of the shepherd, content to walk a long way about, and wait till he came up with the truant, and entreating him kindly, not dragging or beating him back to the flock, but leading and carrying by turns, and so awaiting his opportunity. But Devereux was in one of his moods. He thought the doctor no friend to his suit, and was bitter, and formal, and violent.

---

CHAPTER LXIII.

OF A CERTAIN TEMPEST THAT AROSE AND SHOOK THE CAPTAIN'S SPOONS AND TEA-CUPS; AND HOW THE WIND
SUDDENLY WENT DOWN.

"I'm very glad, sir, to have a few quiet minutes with you," said the Doctor, making then a little pause; and Devereux thought he was going to re-open the matter of his suit. "For I've had no answer to my last letter, and I want to know all you can tell me of that most promising young man, Daniel Loftus, and his most curious works."

"Dan Loftus is dead and ——" (I'm sorry to say he added something else); "and his works have followed him, sir," said the strange Captain, savagely; for he could not conceive what business the Doctor had to think about him, when Captain Devereux's concerns were properly to be discussed. So though he had reason to believe he was quite well, and in Malaga with his "honourable" and sickly cousin, he killed him off-hand, and disposed summarily of his works.

There was an absolute silence of some seconds after this scandalous explosion; and Devereux said—"In truth, sir, I don't know. They hold him capable of taking charge of my wise cousin—hang him!—so I dare say he can take care of himself; and I don't see what the plague ill's to happen him."

The Doctor's honest eyes opened, and his face flushed a little. But reading makes a full man, not a quick one; and so while he was fashioning his answer, the iron cooled. Indeed he never spoke in anger. When on sudden provocation he carried his head higher and flushed a little, they supposed he was angry; but if he was, this was all he showed of the old Adam, and he held his peace.

So now the Doctor looked down upon the table-cloth, for Devereux's breakfast china and silver were still upon the table, and he marshalled some crumbs he found there, sadly, with his finger, in a row first, and then in a circle, and then, goodness knows how; and he sighed profoundly over his work.

Devereux was in his mood. He was proud—he had no notion of apologizing. But looking another way, and with his head rather high, he hoped Miss Lilius was better.

Well, well. The spring was coming; and Parson Walsingham knew the spring restored little Lily. "She's like a bird—she's like a flower, and the winter is nearly past," (and the beautiful words of the "Song of Songs" mingled like a reverie in his discourse, and he said), "the flowers will soon appear in the earth, the time of the singing-birds will come, and the voice of the turtle be heard in our land."

"Sir," said Dick Devereux, in a voice that sounded strangely, "I have a request; may I make it?—a favour to beg. If I write a letter, and place it open in your hand—a letter, sir—to Miss Lily—will you read it to her, or else let her read it? Or even a message—a spoken message—will you give it?"

"Captain Devereux," said the Doctor, in a reserved but very sad sort of way, "I must tell you that my dear child is by no means well. She has had a cold, and it has not gone away so soon as usual, and so she requires care, my little Lily, a great deal of care. But, thank God, the spring is before us. Yes, yes; the soft air and sunshine, and then she'll be out again. You know the garden, and her visits, and her little walks. So I don't fret or despair. Oh, no." He spoke very gently, in a reverie, after his wont, and he sighed heavily. "You know 'tis growing late in life with me, Captain Devereux," he resumed, "and I would fain see her united to a kind and tender partner, for I think she's a fragile little flower. Poor little Lily! Something, I often think, of her dear mother's delicacy, and I have always nursed her, you know. She has been a great pet;" and he stopped suddenly, and walked to the window, "a great pet. Indeed, if she could have been spoiled, I should have spoiled her long ago, but she could not. Ah, no! Sweet little Lily."

Then quite firmly but gently Parson Walsingham went on:

"Now, the Doctors say she mustn't be agitated, and I can't allow it, Captain Devereux. I gave her your message—let me see—why 'tis four, ay, five months ago. I gave it with a good will, for I thought well of you."

"And you don't any longer—there, 'tis all out," broke in Devereux, fiercely.

"Well, you know her answer; it was not lightly given, nor in haste, and first and last 'twas quite decided, and I sent it to you under my own hand."

"I thought you were a friend to me, Dr. Walsingham, and now I'm sure you're none," said the young fellow, in the same bitter tone.

"Ah, Captain Devereux, he can be no friend to you who is a friend to your faults; and you no friend to yourself if you be an enemy to him that would tell you of them. Will you like him the worse that would have you better?"

"We've all faults, sir; mine are not the worst, and I'll have neither shrift nor absolution. There's some reason here you won't disclose."

He was proud, fierce, pale, and glaring, and looked damnably handsome and wicked.

"She gave no reason, sir," answered Dr. Walsingham. "No, she gave none; but, as I understood, she did not love you, and she prayed me to mention it no more."

"She gave me no reason ; but you know the reason," glared out Devereux.

"Indeed, sir, I do not know the reason," answered the Rector.

"But you know—you must—you meant—you, at least, had heard some ill of me, and you no longer wish my suit to prosper."

"I have, indeed, of late, heard much ill of you, Captain Devereux," answered Dr. Walsingham, in a very deliberate but melancholy way, "enough to make me hold you no meet husband for any wife who cared for a faithful partner, or an honourable and a quiet home."

"You mean—I know you do—that Palmerstown girl, who has belied me ?" cried Devereux.

"That unhappy young woman, Captain Devereux, her name is Glynn, whom you betrayed, under a promise of marriage."

That moment Devereux was on his feet. It was the apparition of Devereux ; a blue fire gleaming in his eyes, not a word from his white lips, while three seconds might have ticked from Mrs. Irons' prosy old clock on the stair-head ; his slender hand was outstretched in appeal and defiance, and something half celestial, half infernal—the fallen angelic—in his whole face and bearing.

"May my merciful Creator strike me dead, here at your feet, Dr. Walsingham, but 'tis a lie," cried he. "I never promised—she'll tell you. I thought she told you long ago. 'Twas that devil incarnate, her mother, who forged the lie, why or wherefore, except for her fiendish love of mischief, I know not."

"I cannot tell, sir, about your promise," said the Doctor, gravely ; "with or without it, the crime is heinous, the cruelty immeasurable."

"Doctor Walsingham," cried Dick Devereux, a strange scorn ringing in his accents, "with all your learning; you don't know the world ; you don't know human nature ; you don't see what's passing in this very village before your eyes, every day you live. I'm not worse than others ; I'm not half so bad as fifty older fellows who ought to know better; but I'm sorry, and 'tisn't easy to say that, for I'm proud, as proud as the devil, as proud as you, and if it were to my Maker, what more can I say. I'm sorry, and if heaven forgives us when we repent, I think our wretched fellow-mortals may."

"Captain Devereux, I've nothing to forgive," said the parson, kindly.

"But I tell you, sir, this cruel, unmeaning separation, will be my eternal ruin," cried Devereux. "Listen to me—by heaven, you shall; I've fought a hard battle, sir. I've tried to forget her—to hate her—it won't do. I tell you, Dr. Walsingham, 'tis not in your nature to comprehend the intensity of my love—you can't. I don't blame you. But I think, sir—I think I might make her like me, sir. I only ask to plead my own sad cause. I only want to see her—gracious heaven—but to see her—to show her how I was wronged—to tell her she can make me what she will—an honourable, pure, self-denying, devoted man, or leave me in the dark, alone, with nothing for it but to wrap my cloak about my head, and leap over the precipice."

"Captain Devereux, why will you doubt me? I've spoken the truth. I have already said I must not give you message; and you are not to suppose I dislike you, because I would fain have your faults mended."

"Faults! have I? To be sure I have. So have you, more, sir, and worse than I, may be," cried Devereux, wild again; "and you come here in your spiritual pride to admonish and to lecture, and to insult a miserable man, who's better, perhaps, than yourself. You've heard ill of me? you hear I sometimes drink maybe a glass too much—who does not? and you listen to every damned slander that any villain, to whose vices and idleness you pander with what you call your alma, may be pleased to invent, and you deem yourself charitable; save us from such charity! Charitable, and you refuse to deliver my miserable message: hard-hearted Pharisee!"

It is plain poor Captain Devereux was not quite himself—bitter, fierce, half mad, and by no means so polite as he ought to have been. Alas! as Job says, "ye imagine to reprove words; and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind."

"Ah, Captain Devereux, you are angry with me, and yet 'tis not my doing; the man that is at variance with himself will hardly be at one with others. You have said much to me that is unjust, and, perhaps, unseemly; but I won't reproach you, your anger and trouble make wild work with your words. When one of my people falls into sin, I ever find it is so through lack of prayer. Ah! Captain Devereux, have you not been of late remiss in the duty of private prayer?"

The Captain laughed, not pleasantly, into the ashes in the grate. But the doctor did not mind, and only said, looking upward—

"Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died."

There was kindness, and even tenderness, in the tone in which simple Dr. Walsingham spoke the appellative, brother; and it smote Devereux now, as sometimes happens with wayward fellows, and his better nature was suddenly moved.

"I'm sorry, sir—I am. You're too patient—I'm very sorry; 'tis like an angel—you're noble, sir, and I such an outcast. I—I wish you'd strike me, sir—you're too kind and patient, sir, and so pure—and how have I spoken to you? A trial, sir, if you can forgive me—one trial—my vice—you shall see me changed, a new man. Oh, sir, let me swear it. I am, sir—I'm reformed; don't believe me till you see it. Oh! good Samaritan, don't forsake me—I'm all one wound."

Well! they talked some time longer, and parted kindly.

---

CHAPTER LXIV.

IN WHICH A CERTAIN TROUBLED SPIRIT WALKS.

MR. DANGERFIELD was at the Club that night, and was rather in spirits than otherwise, except, indeed, when poor Charles Nutter was talked of. Then he looked grave, and shrugged, and shook his head, and said—

“A bad business, sir; and where’s his poor wife?”

“Spending the night with us, poor soul,” said Major O’Neill, mildly, “and hasn’t an idaya, poor thing; and indeed, I hope, she mayn’t hear it.”

“Pooh! sir, she must hear it; but you know she might have heard worse, sir, eh?” rejoined Dangerfield.

“True for you, sir,” said the Major, suspending the filling of his pipe to direct a quiet glance of significance at Dangerfield, and then closing his eyes with a nod.

And just at this point in came Spaight.

“Well, Spaight!”

“Well, sir.”

“You saw the body, eh?” and a dozen other interrogatories followed, as cold and wet with melting snow, dishevelled, and storm-beaten—for it was a plaguey rough night—the young fellow, with a general greeting to the company, made his way to the fire.

“’Tis a tremendous night, gentlemen, so by your leave I’ll stir the fire—and, yes, I seen him, poor Nutter—and, paugh, an ugly sight he is, I can tell you; here, Larry, bring me a rummer-glass of punch—his right ear’s gone, and a’most all his right hand—and screeching hot, do you mind—an’, phiew—altogether ’tis sickening—them fishes, you know—I’m a’most sorry I went in—you remember Dogherty’s whiskey shop in Ringsend—he lies in the back parlour, and wondherful little changed in appearance.”

And so Mr. Spaight with a little round table at his elbow, and his heels over the fender, sipped his steaming punch, and thawed inwardly and outwardly, as he answered their questions and mixed in their speculations.

Up at the Mills, which had heard the awful news, first from the Widow Macan, and afterwards from Pat Moran, the maids sat over their tea in the kitchen in high excitement and thrilling chat—"The poor master;" "oh, the poor man;" "oh, la, what's that," with a start and a peep over the shoulders; "and oh, dear, and how in the world will the poor little mistress ever live over the news," and so forth, made a principal part of their talk. There was a good accompaniment of wind outside, and a soft pelting of snow on the window panes, "and oh, my dear life, but wasn't it dark!"

Up went Moggy, with her thick-wick'd kitchen candle, to seek repose; and Betty, resolving not to be long behind, waited only "to wash up her plates" and slack down the fire, having made up her mind, for she grew more nervous in solitude, to share Moggy's bed for that night.

Moggy had not been twenty minutes gone, and her task was nearly ended, when—"Oh, blessed saints!" murmurs Betty, with staring eyes, and dropping the sweeping-brush on the flags, she heard, or thought she heard, her master's step, which was peculiar, crossing the floor overhead.

She listened, herself as pale as a corpse, and nearly as breathless; but there was nothing now but the muffled gusts of the storm, and the close soft beat of the snow, so she listened and listened, but nothing came of it.

"'Tis only the vapours," said Betty, drawing a long breath, and doing her best to be cheerful; and so she finished her labours, stopping every now and then to listen, and humming tunes very loud, in fits and starts. Then it came to her turn to take her candle and go up stairs; she was a good half hour later than Moggy—all was quiet within the house—only the sound of the storm—the creak and rattle of its strain, and the hurly-burly of the gusts over the roof and chimneys.

Over her shoulder she peered jealously this way and that, as with flaring candle she climbed the stairs. How black the window looked on the lobby, with its white patterns of snow flakes in perpetual succession sliding down the panes. Who could tell what horrid face might be looking in close to her as she passed, secure in the darkness and that drifting white lace veil of snow? So nimbly and lightly up the stairs climbed Betty, the cook.

If listeners seldom hear good of themselves, it is also true that peepers sometimes see more than they like; and Betty, the cook, as she reached the landing, glancing askance with ominous curiosity, beheld a spectacle, the sight of which nearly bereft her of her senses.

Crouching in the deep doorway on the right of the lobby, the cook, I say, saw something—a figure—or a deep shadow—only a deep shadow—or maybe a dog. She lifted the candle—she peeped under the candlestick: 'twas no shadow; as I live, 'twas a well-defined figure!

He was draped in black, cowering down low, with the face turned up. It was Charles Nutter's face, fixed and stealthy. It was only while the fascination lasted—while you might count one, two, three, deliberately—that the horrid gaze met mutually. But there was no mistake there. She saw the stern dark picture as plainly as ever she did. The light glimmered on his white eyeballs.

Starting up, he struck at the candle with his hat. She uttered a loud scream, and flinging stick and all at the figure, with a great clang against the door behind, all was swallowed in instantaneous darkness; she whirled into the opposite bedroom she knew not how, and locked the door within, and plunged head-foremost under the bed-clothes, half mad with terror.

The squall was heard of course. Moggy heard it, but she heeded not; for Betty was known to scream at mice, and even moths. And as her door was heard to slam, as was usual in panics of the sort, and as she returned no answer, Moggy was quite sure there was nothing in it.

But Moggy's turn was to come. When spirits "walk," I've heard they make the most of their time, and sometimes pay a little round of visits on the same evening.

This is certain; Moggy was by no means so great a fool as Betty in respect of hobgoblins, witches, banshees, pookas, and the world of spirits in general. She eat heartily, and slept soundly, and as yet had never seen the devil. Therefore, such terrors as she that night experienced were new to her, and I can't reasonably doubt the truth of her narrative. Awaking suddenly in the night, she saw a light in the room, and heard a quiet rustling going on in the corner, where the old white-painted press showed its front from the wall. So Moggy popped her head through her thin curtains at the side, and—blessed hour!—there she saw the shape of a man looking into the press, the doors being wide open, and the appearance of a key in the lock, though she well knew the mistress had taken it away with her.

The shape was very like her master. The saints between us and harm! The glow was reflected back from the interior of the press, and showed the front part of the figure in profile with a sharp line of light. She said he had some sort of thick slippers over his boots, a dark coat, with the cape buttoned, and a hat flapping over his face; coat and hat, and all, sprinkled over with snow.

As if he heard the rustle of the curtain, he turned towards the bed, and with an awful ejaculation she cried, "'Tis you, sir!"

"Don't stir, and you'll meet no harm," he said, and over he posts to the bedside, and he laid his cold hand on her wrist, and told her again to be quiet, and for her life to tell no one what she had seen, and with that she supposed she swooned away; for the next thing she remembered was listening in mortal fear, the room being all dark, and she heard a sound at the press again, and then steps crossing the floor, and she gave herself up for lost; but he did not come to the bedside any more, and the tread passed out at the door, and so, as she thought, went down stairs.

In the morning the press was locked and the door shut, and the hall-door and back-door locked, and the keys on the hall table, where they had left them the night before.

You may be sure these two ladies were thankful to behold the gray light, and hear the cheerful sounds of returning day; and it would be no easy matter to describe which of the two looked most pallid, scared, and jaded that morning, as they drank a hysterical dish of tea together in the kitchen, close up to the window, and with the door shut, discoursing, and crying, and praying over their tea-pot in miserable rivalry.

---

CHAPTER LXV.

HOW AN EVENING PASSES AT THE ELMS, AND DR. TOOLE MAKES A LITTLE EXCURSION; AND TWO CHOICE SPIRITS DIS-COURSE, AND HEBE TRIPS IN WITH THE NECTAR.

UP at the Elms, little Lily that night was sitting in the snug, old-fashioned room, with the good old Rector. She was no better; still in doctor's hands; and weak, but always happy with him, and he more than ever gentle and tender with her; for though he never would give place to despondency, and was naturally of a trusting, cheery spirit, he could not but remember his young wife, lost so early; and once or twice there was a look—an outline—a light—something, in little Lily's fair, girl-ish face that, with a strange, momentary agony, brought back the remembrance of her mother's stricken beauty and plaintive smile. But then his darling's gay talk and pleasant ways would reassure him, and she smiled away the momentary shadow.

And he would tell her all sorts of wonders, old-world gaieties, long before she was born ; and how finely the great Mr. Handel played upon the harpsichord in the Music Hall, and how his talk was in German, Latin, French, English, Italian, and half a dozen languages beside, sentence about ; and how he remembered his own dear mother's dress when she went to Lord Wharton's great ball at the Castle—dear, oh ! dear, how long ago that was ! And then he would relate stories of banshees, and robberies, and ghosts, and hair-breadth escapes, and “ rapparees,” and adventures in the wars of King James, which he heard told in his nonage by the old folk, long vanished, who remembered those troubles.

“ And now, darling,” said little Lily, nestling close to him, with a smile, “ you must tell me all about that strange, handsome Mr. Mervyn ; who he is, and what his story.”

“ Tut, tut ! little rogue——”

“ Yes, indeed, you must, and you will ; you've kept your little Lily waiting long enough for it, and she'll promise to tell nobody.”

“ Handsome he is, and strange, no doubt—it was a strange fancy that funeral. Strange, indeed,” said the Rector.

“ What funeral, darling ? ”

“ Why, yes, a funeral—the bringing his father's body to be laid here in the vault, in my church ; it is their family vault. 'Twas a folly ; but what folly will not young men do ? ”

And the good parson poked the fire a little impatiently.

“ Mr. Mervyn—not Mervyn—that was his mother's name ; but—see, you must not mention it, Lily, if I tell you—not Mr. Mervyn, I say, but my Lord Dunoran, the only son of that disgraced and blood-stained nobleman, who, lying in gaol, under sentence of death for a foul and cowardly murder, swallowed poison, and so closed his guilty life with a tremendous crime, in its nature inexpiable. There, that's all, and too much, darling.

“ And was it very long ago ? ”

“ Why, 'twas before little Lily was born ; and long before that I knew him—only just a little. He used the Tiled House for a hunting-lodge, and kept his dogs and horses there—a fine gentleman, but vicious, always, I fear, and a gamester; an overbearing man, with a dangerous cast of pride in his eye. You don't remember Lady Dunoran? No, to be sure! you could not. 'Tis from her, chiefly, poor lady, he has his good looks. Her eyes were large, and very peculiar, like his—his, you know, are very fine. She, poor lady, did not live long after the public ruin of the family."

"And has he been recognised here? The townspeople are so curious."

"Why, dear child, not one of them ever saw him before. He's been lost sight of by all but a few, a very few friends. My Lord Castlemallard, who was his guardian, of course, knows; and to me he disclosed himself by letter; and we keep his secret: though it matters little who knows it, for it seems to me he's as unhappy as aught could ever make him. The townspeople take him for his cousin, who squandered his fortune in Paris; and how is he the better of their mistake, and how were he the worse if they knew him for whom he is? 'Tis an unhappy family—a curse haunts it. Young in years, old in vice, the wretched nobleman who lies in the vault, by the coffin of that old aunt, scarcely better than himself, whose guineas supplied his early profligacy—alas! he ruined his ill-fated, beautiful cousin, and she died heart-broken, and her little child, both there—in that melancholy and contaminated house."

So he rambled on, and from one tale to another, till little Lily's early bed-hour came.

I don't know whether it was Dr. Walsingham's visit in the morning, and the chance of hearing something about it, that prompted the unquiet Tom Toole to roll his cloak about him, and buffet his way through storm and snow, to Devereux's lodgings. It was only a stone's throw; but even that, on such a night, was no trifle.

However, up he went to Devereux's drawing-room, and found its handsome proprietor altogether in the dumps. The little Doctor threw off his sleety cloak and hat in the lobby, and stood before the officer fresh and puffing, and a little flustered and dazzled after his romp with the wind.

Devereux got up and received him with a slight bow and no smile, and a "Pray take a chair, Doctor Toole."

"Well, this is a bright fit of the dismal," said little Toole, nothing overawed. "May I sit near the fire?"

"Upon it," said Devereux, sadly.

"Thankee," said Toole, clapping his feet on the fender, with a grin, and making himself comfortable. "May I poke it?"

"Eat it—do as you please—anything—everything; play that fiddle (pointing to the ruin of Puddock's guitar, which the Lieutenant had left on the table), or undress and go to bed, or get up and dance a minuet, or take that pistol, with all my heart, and shoot me through the head."

"Thankee, again. A fine choice of amusements, I vow," cried the jolly Doctor.

"There, don't mind me, nor all I say, Toole. I'm, I suppose, in the vapours; but, truly, I'm glad to see you, and I thank you, indeed I do, heartily, for your obliging visit; 'tis very neighbourly. But, hang it, I'm weary of the time—the world is a dull place. I'm tired of this planet, and should not mind cutting my throat and trying a new star. Suppose we make the journey together, Toole; there is a brace of pistols over the chimney, and a fair wind for some of them."

"Rather too much of a gale for my taste, thanking you again," answered Toole with a cosy chuckle; "but, if you're bent on the trip, and can't wait, why, at least let's have a glass together before parting."

"With all my heart, what you will. Shall it be punch?"

"Punch be it. Come, hang saving; get us up a ha'porth of whiskey," said little Toole, gaily.

"Hallo, Mrs. Irons, madam, will you do us the favour to make a bowl of punch as soon as may be!" cried Devereux, over the banister.

"Come, Toole," said Devereux, "I'm very dismal. Losses and crosses, and deuce knows what. Whistle or talk, what you please, I'll listen; tell me anything; stories of horses, dogs, dice, snuff, women, cocks, parsons, wine—what you will. Come, how's Sturk? He's beaten poor Nutter, and won the race; though the stakes, after all, were scarce worth taking—and what's life without a guinea? A worthy man was Sturk, and, in some respects, resembled the prophet, Shylock; but you know nothing of him—why the plague don't you read your Bible, Toole?"

"Well," said Toole, candidly, "I don't know the Old Testament as well as the New; but certainly, whoever he's like, he's held out wonderfully. 'Tis nine weeks since he met that accident, and there he's still, above ground; but that's all—just above ground, you see."

"And how's Cluffe?"

"Pooh, Cluffe indeed! Nothing ever wrong with him but occasional over-eating. Sir, you'd a laughed to-day had you seen him. I gave him a bolus twice the size of a gooseberry. 'What's this?' says he. 'A bolus,' says I. 'The devil,' says he; 'dia-bolus, then,' says I—hey? said I, 'well?' ha! ha! and by Jove, sir, it actually half stuck in his œsophagus, and I shoved it down like a bullet, with a probang; you'd a died a laughing, yet 'twasn't a bit too big. Why, I tell you, upon my honour, Mrs. Rebecca Chatterworth's black boy, only t'other day, swallowed a musket bullet, twice the size, ha! ha!—he did—and I set him to rights in no time with a little powder."

"And is it true old Tresham's going to join our club at last?"

"He! hang him! he's like a brute beast, and never drinks but when he's dry, and then small beer. But, I forgot to tell you, by all that's lovely, they do say the charming Magnolia—a fine bouncing girl that—is all but betrothed to Lieutenant O'Flaherty."

Devereux laughed, and thus encouraged, Toole went on; with a wink and a whisper.

"Why, the night of the ball, you know, he saw her home, and they say he kissed her—by Bacchus, on both sides of the face,—at the door there, under the porch; and you know, if he had not a right, she'd a-knocked him down."

"Psha! the girl's a Christian, and when she receives a smack on one cheek she turns the other. And what says the Major to it?"

"Why, as it happened, he opened the door precisely as the thing occurred; and he wished Lieutenant O'Flaherty good-night, and paid him a visit in the morning. And they say 'tis all satisfactory; and—by Jove! 'tis good punch." And Mrs. Irons entered with a china bowl on a tray.

---

CHAPTER LXVI.

CONCERNING A SECOND HURRICANE THAT RAGED IN CAPTAIN DEVEREUX'S DRAWING-ROOM, AND RELATING HOW MRS. IRONS WAS ATTACKED WITH A SORT OF CHOKING IN HER BED.

AND the china bowl, with its silver ladle, and fine fragrance of lemon and old malt whiskey, and a social pair of glasses, were placed on the table by fair Mistress Irons; and Devereux filled his glass, and Toole did likewise; and the little Doctor rattled on; and Devereux threw in his word, and finally sang a song. 'Twas a ballad, with little in the words; but the air was sweet and plaintive, and so was the singer's voice:—

"A star so high,
In my sad sky,
I've early loved and late;
A clear lone star,
Serene and far,
Doth rule my wayward fate.

THE HOUSE BY

Tho' dark and chill,
 The night be still,
 A light comes up for me :
 In eastern skies
 My star doth rise,
 And fortune dawns for me.

And proud and bold,
 My way I hold ;
 For o'er me high I see
 In night's deep blue,
 My star shine true,
 And fortune beams on me.

Now onward still,
 Thro' dark and chill,
 My lonely way must be ;
 In vain regret,
 My star will set,
 And fortune's dark for me.

And whether glad,
 Or proud, or sad,
 Or howsoever I be ;
 In dawn, or noon,
 Or setting soon,
 My star, I'll follow thee."

And so there was a pause and a silence. In the silvery notes of the singer there was the ring of a prophecy ; and Toole half-read its meaning. And himself loving a song, and being soft over his music, he remained fixed for a few seconds, and then sighed, smiling, and dried his light blue eyes covertly ; and he praised the song and singer briskly ; and sighed again, with his fingers on the stem of his glass. And by this time Devereux had drawn the window-curtain, and was looking across the river, through the darkness, towards the Elms, perhaps for that solitary distant light—his star—now blurred and lost in the storm. Whatever his contemplations, it was plain, when he turned about, that the dark spirit was upon him again.

"Curse that punch," said he, in language still more emphatic. "You're like Mephistophiles in the play—you come in upon my quiet to draw me to ruin. 'Twas the devil, sir, sent you here, to kill my soul, I believe; but you shan't. Drink, will you?—ay—I'll give you a draught—a draught of air will cool you. Drink to your heart's content."

And to Toole's consternation, up went the window, and a hideous rush of eddying storm and snow whirled into the room. Out went the candles—the curtains flapped high in the air, and lashed the ceiling—the door banged with a hideous crash—papers, and who knows what beside, went spinning, hurry-scurry, round the room; and Toole's wig was very near taking wing from his head.

"Hey—hey—hey! holloo!" cried the Doctor, out of breath, and with his artificial ringlets frisking about his chops and eyes.

"Out, sorcerer—temptation begone—avaunt Mephistophiles—cauldron away!" thundered the Captain; and sure enough, from the open window, through the icy sleet, whirled the jovial bowl; and the jingle of the china was heard faint through the tempest.

Toole was swearing, in the whirlwind and darkness, like a trooper.

"Thank heaven! 'tis gone," continued Devereux; "I'm safe—no thanks to you, though; and, hark ye, Doctor, I'm best alone; leave me—leave me, pray—and pray forgive me."

The Doctor groped and stumbled out of the room, growling all the while, and the door slammed behind him with a crash like a cannon.

"The fellow's brain's disordered—delirium tremens, and jump out of that cursed window, I wouldn't wonder," muttered the Doctor, adjusting his wig on the lobby, and then calling rather mildly over the banisters, he brought up Mrs. Irons with a candle, and found his cloak, hat, and cane; and with a mysterious look beckoned that matron to follow him, and in the hall, winking up towards the ceiling at the spot where Devereux might at the moment be presumed to be standing—

"I say, has he been feverish or queer, or—eh?—any way humorsome or out of the way?" And then—"See now, you may as well have an eye after him, and if you remark anything strange, don't fail to let me know—d'ye see; and for the present you had better get him to shut his window and light his candles."

And so the Doctor, wrapped in his mantle, plunged into the hurricane and darkness; and was sensible, with a throb of angry regret, of a whiff of punch rising from the footpath, as he turned the corner of the steps.

An hour later, Devereux being alone, called to Mrs. Irons, and receiving her with a courteous gravity, he said—

"Madam, will you be so good as to lend me your Bible?"

Devereux was prosecuting his reformation, which, as the reader sees, had set in rather tempestuously, but was now settling in serenity and calm.

Mrs. Irons only said—

"My—?" and then paused, doubting her ears.

"Your Bible, if you please, madam."

"Oh?—oh! my Bible? I—to be sure, Captain, jewel," and she peeped at his face, and loitered for a while at the door; for she had unpleasant misgivings about him, and did not know what to make of his request, so utterly without parallel. She'd have fiddled at the door some time longer, speculating about his sanity, but that Devereux turned full upon her with a proud stare, and rising, he made her a slight bow, and said: "I thank you, madam," with a sharp courtesy, that said: "avaunt, and quit my sight!" so sternly, that she vanished on the instant; and down stairs she marvelled with Juggy Byrne, "what the puck the Captain could want of a Bible!" Upon my conscience it sounds well. It's what he's not right in his head, I'm afeared. A Bible!"

And they tumbled about the rattletaps under the cupboard, and rummaged the drawers in search of the sacred volume. For though Juggy said there was no such thing, and never had been in her time, Mrs. Irons put her down with asperity. It was not to be found, however, and the matron thought she remembered that old Mrs. Legge's cook had borrowed it some time ago for a charm. So she explained the accident to Captain Devereux, who said—

"I thank you, madam; 'tis no matter. I wish you a good-night, madam;" and the door closed.

"No Bible!" says Devereux; "the old witch!"

Mrs. Irons never spared her rhetoric, which was fierce, shrill, and fluent, when the exercise of that gift was called for. The parish clerk bore it with a cynical and taciturn patience, not perhaps so common as it should be in his sex; and this night, when she awoke, and her eyes rested on the form of her husband at her bedside, with a candle lighted, and buckling on his shoes with his foot on the chair, she sat up straight in her bed, wide awake in an instant, for it was wonderful how the sight of that meek man roused the wife in her bosom, especially after an absence, and she had not seen him since four o'clock that evening; so you may suppose his reception was warm, and her expressions every way worthy of her feelings.

Meek Irons finished buckling that shoe, and then lifted the other to the edge of the chair, and proceeded to do the like for it, serenely, after his wont, and seeming to hear nothing. So Mrs. Irons proceeded, as was her custom when that patient person refused to be roused—she grasped his collar near his cheek, meaning to shake him into attention.

But instantly, as the operation commenced, the clerk gripped her with his long, horny fingers by the throat, with a snap so sure and energetic that not a cry, not a gasp even, or a wheeze, could escape through "the trachea," as medical men have it; and her face and forehead purpled up, and her eyes goggled and glared in her head; and her husband looked so insanely wicked, that, as the pale picture darkened before her, and she heard curse after curse, and one foul name after another hiss off his tongue, like water off a hot iron, in her ringing ears, she gave herself up for lost. He closed this exercise by chucking her head viciously against the board of the bed half-a-dozen times, and leaving her thereafter a good deal more confused even than on the eventful evening when he had first declared his love.

So soon as she came a little to herself, and saw him coolly buttoning his leggings at the bedside, his buckles being adjusted by this time, her fear subsided, or rather her just indignation rose above it and drowned it; and she was on the point of breaking out afresh, only in a way commensurate with her wrongs, and proportionately more formidable; when, on the first symptom of attack, he clutched her, if possible, tighter; the gaping, goggling, purpling, the darkening of vision and humming in ears, all recommenced; likewise the knocking of her head with improved good-will, and, spite of her struggles and scratching, the bewildered lady, unused to even a show of insurrection, underwent the same horrid series of sensations at the hands of her rebellious lord.

When they had both had enough of it, Mr. Irons went on with his buttoning, and his lady gradually came to. This time, however, she was effectually frightened—too much so even to resort to hysterics, for she was not quite sure that when he had buttoned the last button of his left legging he might not resume operations, and terminate their conjugal relations.

When he had adjusted his leggings, he stood lithe and erect at the bedside, and with his fist at her face, delivered a short charge, the point of which was, that unless she lay like a mouse till morning he'd have her life, though he hanged for it. And with that he drew the curtain, and was hidden from her sight for some time.

---

CHAPTER LXVII.

IN WHICH AN UNEXPECTED VISITER IS SEEN IN THE CEDAR-PARLOUR OF THE TILED HOUSE, AND THE STORY OF MR. BEAUCLERO AND THE "FLOWER DE LUCE" BEGINS TO BE UNFOLDED.

It was an awful night, indeed, on which all this occurred, and that apparition had shown itself up at the Mills. And truly it would seem the devil had business on his hands, for in the cedar-parlour of the Tiled House another unexpected manifestation occurred just about the same hour.

What gentleman is there of broken fortunes, undefined rights, and in search of evidence, without a legal adviser of some sort? Mr. Mervyn, of course, had his, and paid for the luxury according to custom. And every now and then off went a despatch from the Tiled House to the oracular London attorney; sometimes it was a budget of evidence and sometimes only a string of queries. To-night, to the awful diapason of the storm, he was penning one of these—the fruit of a tedious study of many papers and letters, tied up in bundles by his desk, all of them redolent of ominous or fearful associations.

I don't know why it is the hours fly with such a strange celerity in the monotony and solitude of such nightwork. But Mervyn was surprised, as many a one similarly occupied has been, on looking at his watch, to find that it was now long past midnight; so he threw himself back in his chair with a sigh, and thought how vainly his life was speeding away, and heard, with a sort of wonder, how mad was the roar of the storm without, while he had quietly penned his long rescript undisturbed.

The wild bursts of supernatural fury and agony which swell and mingle in a hurricane, I dare say, led his imagination a strange aerial journey through the dark. Now it was the baying of hell hounds, and the long shriek of the spirit that flies before them. Anon it was the bellowing thunder of an ocean, and the myriad voices of shipwreck. And the old house quivering from base to cornice under the strain; and then there would come a pause, like a gasp, and the thunder once more rolled up, and the same mad hubbub shook and clamoured at the windows.

So he let his Pegasus spread his pinions on the blast, and mingled with the wild rout that peopled the darkness; or, in plainer words, he abandoned his fancy to the haunted associations of the hour, the storm, and the house, with a not unpleasant horror. In one of these momentary lulls of the wind, there came a sharp, distinct knocking on the window-pane.

It is all very well weaving the sort of dream or poem with which Mervyn was half amusing and half awing himself, but the sensation is quite different when a questionable sound or sight comes uninvited to take the matter out of the province of our fancy and the control of our will. Mervyn found himself on his legs, and listening in a very real sort of horror, with his gaze fixed in the direction of that small sharp knocking. But the storm was up again, and drowning every other sound in its fury.

If Mr. Mervyn had been sufficiently frightened, he would have forthwith made good his retreat to his bed-room, or, if he had not been frightened at all, he would have kept his seat, and allowed his fancies to return to their old channel. But, in fact, he took a light in his hand, and opened a bit of the window-shutter. The snow, however, was spread over the panes in a white, sliding curtain, that returned the light of his candle, and hid all without. 'Twas idle trying to peer through it, but as he did, the palm of a hand was suddenly applied to the glass on the outside, and began briskly to rub off the snow, as if to open a peep-hole for distinct inspection.

It was to be more this time than the apparition of a hand—a human face was immediately presented close to the glass—not that of Nutter either—no—it was the face of Irons—pale, with glittering eyes and blue chin, and wet hair quivering against the glass in the storm.

He nodded wildly to Mervyn, brushing away the snow, beckoning towards the back-door, as he supported himself on one knee on the window-sill, and with his lips close to the glass, cried, "let me in;" but, in the uproar of the storm, it was by his gestures, imperfectly as they were seen, rather than by his words, that Mervyn comprehended his meaning.

Down goes Mr. Mervyn, without a moment's hesitation, leaving the candle standing on the passage table, draws the bolts, opens the door, and in rushes Irons, in a furious gust, his cloak whirling about his head amidst a bitter eddying of snow, and a distant clapping of doors throughout the house.

The door secured again, Mr. Irons stood, in his beflaked and dripping mantle, storm-tossed, dishevelled, and alone once again in the shelter of the Tiled House, to explain the motive of his visit.

"Irons! I could hardly believe it," and he made a pause, and then, filled with the one idea, he vehemently demanded, "In Heaven's name, have you come to tell me all you know?"

"Well maybe—no," answered the clerk; "I don't know; I'll tell you something. I'm going, you see, and I came here on my way; and I'll tell you more than last time, but not all—not all yet."

"Going? and where?—what are your plans?"

"Plans?—I've no plans. Where am I going?—nowhere—anywhere. I'm going away, that's all."

"You are leaving this place—eh, to return no more?"

"I'm leaving it to-night; I've the Doctor's leave, Parson Walsingham. What d'ye look at, sir; d'ye think it's what I murdered any one? not but if I staid here I might though," and Mr. Irons laughed a frightened, half maniacal sort of laugh. "I'm going for a bit, a fortnight, or so, maybe, till things get quiet—(lead us not into temptation!)—to Mullingar, or anywhere; only I won't stay longer at hell's door, within stretch of that devil's long arm."

"Come to the parlour," said Mervyn, perceiving that Irons was chilled and shivering.

There, with the door and window-shutters closed, a pair of candles on the table, and a couple of faggots of that pleasant bog-wood, which blazes so readily and fragrantly on the hearth, Irons shook off his cloak, and stood, lank and grim, and, as it seemed to Mervyn, horribly scared, but well in view, and trying sullenly, to collect his thoughts.

"I'm going away, I tell you, for a little while; but I'm come to see you, sir, to think what I may tell you now, and, above all, to warn you again' saying to any living soul one word of what passed between us when I last was here; you've kept your word honourable as yet; if you break it I'll not return," and he clenched it with an oath, "I darn't return."

"I'll tell you the way it happened," he resumed. "'Tis a good while now—ay, twenty-two years; your noble father's dead these twenty-two years and upwards. 'Twas a bad murder, sir; they wor both bad murderers. I look on it, he's a murdered man."

"He—who?" demanded the young man.

"Your father, sir."

"My father murdered?" said Mervyn.

"Well, I see no great differ; I see none at all. I'll tell you how it was."

And he looked over his shoulder again, and into the corners of the room, and then Mr. Irons began—

"I believe, sir, there's no devil like a vicious young man, with a hard heart and cool courage, in want of money. Of all the men I ever met with, or heard tell of, Charles Archer was the most dreadful. I used sometimes to think he was the devil. It wasn't longheaded or cunning he was, but he knew your thoughts before you half knew them yourself. He knew what every one was thinking of. He made up his mind at a glance, and struck like a thunderbolt. As for pity or fear, he did not know what they were, and his cunning was so deep, and sure there was no catching him.

"He came down to the Pied Horse Inn, where I was a drawer, at Newmarket, twice."

Mervyn looked in his face, quickly, with a ghastly kind of start.

"Ay, sir, av coorse you know it; you read the trial; av coorse you did. Well, he came down there twice. 'Twas a good old house, sir, lots of room, and a well-accustomed inn. An' I think there was but two bad men among all the servants of the house—myself and Glascock. He was an under hostler, and a bad boy. He chose us two out of the whole lot, with a look. He never made a mistake. He knew us some way like a crow knows carrion, and he used us cleverly."

And Irons cursed him.

"He's a hard master, like his own," said Irons; "his wages come to nothing, and his service is hell itself. He could sing, and talk, and drink, and keep things stirring, and the gentlemen liked him; and he was, 'twas said, a wonderful fine player at whist, and piquet, and ombre, and all sorts of card-playing. So you see he could afford to play fair. The first time he came down, he fought three duels about a tipsy quarrel over a pool of Pope Joan. There was no slur on his credit, though; 'twas just a bit of temper. He wounded all three; two but trifling; but one of them—Chapley, or Capley, I think, was his name—through the lungs, and he died, I heard, abroad. I saw him killed—'twasn't the last; 'twas done while you'd count ten. Mr. Archer came up with a sort of a sneer, pale and angry, and 'twas a clash of the small-swords—one, two, three, and a spring like a tiger—and all over. He was frightful strong; ten times as strong as he looked—all a deception.

"Well, sir, there was a Jew came down, offering wages, not, you see, to gentlemen, sir, but to poor fellows. And Mr. Archer put me and Glascock up to bite him, as he said; and he told us to back Strawberry, and we did. We had that opinion of his judgment and his knowledge—you see, we thought he had ways of finding out these things—that we had no doubt of winning, so we made a wager of twelve pounds. But we had no money—not a crown between us—and we must stake gold with the host of the ‘Plume of Feathers;’ and the long and the short of it was, I never could tell how he put it into our heads, to pledge some of the silver spoons and a gold chain of the master’s, intending to take them out when we won the money. Well, Strawberry lost, and we were left in the lurch. So we told Mr. Archer how it was; for he was an off-handed man when he had anything in view, and he told us, as we thought, he’d help us if we lost. ‘Help you,’ says he, with a sort of laugh he had, ‘I want help myself; I haven’t a guinea, and I’m afraid you’ll be hanged; and then,’ says he, ‘stay a bit, and I’ll find a way.’

“I think he was in a bad plight just then himself; he was awful expensive with horses and—and—other things; and I think there was a writ or maybe more, out against him, from other places, and he wanted a lump of money in his hand to levant with, and go abroad. Well, listen, and don’t be starting, or making a row, sir,” and a sulky, lowering, hangdog shadow, came over Irons. “Your father, Lord Dunoran, played cards; his partner was Mr. Charles Archer. Whist it was—with a gentleman of the name of Beauclerc, and I forgot the other—he wore a chocolate suit, and a black wig. ’Twas I carried them their wine. Well, Mr. Beauclerc won, and Mr. Archer stopped playing, for he had lost enough; and the gentleman in the chocolate—what was his name?—Edwards, I think—ay, ’twas—yes, Edwards, it was—was tired, and turned himself about to the fire, and took a pipe of tobacco; and my lord, your father, played piquet with Mr. Beauclerc; and he lost a power of money to him, sir, and, by bad luck, he paid a great part of it, as they played, in rouleaus of gold, for he had won at the dice down stairs. Well, Mr. Beauclerc was a little hearty, and he grew tired, and was for going to bed. But my lord was angry, and being disguised with liquor too, he would not let him go till they played more; and play they did, and the luck still went the same way; and my lord grew fierce over it, and curaced and drank, and that did not mend his luck you may be sure; and at last Mr. Beaucherc swears he'd play no more; and both kept talking together, and neither heard well what t'other said; but there was some talk about settling the dispute in the morning.

"Well, sir, in goes Mr. Beaucherc, staggering—his room was the flower de luce—and down he throws himself, clothes an' all, on his bed; and then my lord turned on Mr. Edwards, I'm sure, that was his name, and persuades him to play at piquet; and to it they went.

"As I was coming in with more wine, I meets Mr. Archer coming out, 'Give them their wine,' says he, in a whisper, 'and follow me.' An' so I did. 'You know something of Glascock, and have a fast hold of him,' says he, 'and tell him quietly to bring up Mr. Beaucherc's boots, and come back along with him; and bring me a small glass of rum.' And back he goes into the room where the two were stuck in their cards, and talking and thinking of nothing else.

---

CHAPTER LXVIII.

IN WHICH MR. IRONS' NARRATIVE REACHES MERTON MOOR.

"WELL, I did as he bid me, and set the glass of rum before him, and in place of drinking it, he follows me out. 'I told you,' says he, 'I'd find a way, and I'm going to give you fifty guineas a piece. Stand you at the stair-head,' says he to Glascock, 'and listen; and if you hear any one coming, step into Mr. Beaucherc's room with his boots, do you see, for I'm going to rob him,' I thought I'd a fainted, and Glascock, that was a tougher lad than me, was staggered ; but Mr. Archer had a way of taking you by surprise, and getting you into a business before you knew where you are going. 'I see, sir,' says Glascock. 'And come you in, and I'll do it,' says Mr. Archer, and in we went, and Mr. Beauclerc was fast asleep.

"Well, he did rob him, and I often thought how cunningly, for he took no more than about half his gold, well knowing, I'm now sure, neither he nor my lord, your father, kept any count ; and there was a bundle of notes in his pocket-book, which Mr. Archer was thinning swiftly, when all of a sudden, like a ghost rising, up sits Mr. Beauclerc, an unlucky rising it was for him, and taking him by the collar—he was a powerful strong man —'You've robbed me, Archer,' says he. I was behind Mr. Archer, and I could not see what happened, but Mr. Beauclerc made a sort of a start and a kick out with his foot, and seemed taken with a tremble all over, for while you count three, and he fell back in the bed with his eyes open, and Mr. Archer drew a thin long dagger out of the dead man's breast, for dead he was. 'What are you afraid of, you — fool?' says he, shaking me up ; 'I know what I'm about ; I'll carry you through ; your life's in my hands, mine in yours, only be cool.' He was that himself, if ever man was, and quick as light he closed the dead man's eyes, saying, 'in for a penny in for a pound,' and he threw a bit of the coverlet over his breast, and his mouth and chin, just as a man might draw it rolling round in the bed, for I suppose he thought it best to hide the mouth that was open, and told its tale too plainly, and out he was on the lobby the next instant. 'Don't tell Glascock what's happened, 'twill make him look queer ; let him put in the boots, and if he's asked, say Mr. Beauclerc made a turn in the bed, and a grumbling, like a man turning over in his sleep, while he was doing so, d'ye see, and divide this, 'twill settle your little trouble, you know.' 'Twas a little paper roll of a hundred guineas. An' that's the way Mr. Beauclerc came by his death."

This to Mervyn was the sort of shock that might have killed an older man. The dreadful calamity that had stigmatized and beggared his family—the horror and shame of which, he well remembered, when first revealed to him, had held him trembling and tongue-tied for more than an hour before tears came to his relief, and which had ever since blackened his sky, with a monotony of storm and thunder, was in a moment shown to be a chimera. No wonder that he was for a while silent, stunned, and bewildered. At last he was able—pale and cold—to lift up his clasped hands, his eyes, and his heart, in awful gratitude, to the Author of Mercy, the Revealer of Secrets, the Lord of Life and Truth.

“And where is this Charles Archer—is he dead or living?” urged Mervyn with an awful adjuration.

“Ay, where to catch him, and how—Dead? Well, he’s dead to some, you see, and living to others; and living or dead, I’ll put you on his track some fine day, if you’re true to me; but not yet a while, and if you turn stag, or name my name to living soul you’ll never hear word more from me, and I think, sir, you’ll lose your life beside.”

“Your threats of violence are lost on me, I can take care of myself,” said Mervyn, haughtily.

The clerk smiled a strange sort of smile.

“But I’ve already pledged my sacred honor not to mention your name or betray your secret.”

“Well, just have patience, and maybe I’ll not keep you long; but ’tis no trifle for a man to make up his mind to what’s before me, maybe.”

After a pause, Irons resumed—

“Well, sir, you see, Mr. Archer sat down by the fire and smoked a pipe, and was as easy and pleased, you’d say, to look on him, as a man need be; and he called for cards when my lord wanted them, and whatever else he needed, making himself busy and bustling—as I afterwards thought, to make them both remember well that he was in the room with them.”

"In and out of the chamber I went with one thing or another, and every time I passed Mr. Beauclerc's room I grew more and more frightened; and, truth to say, I was a scared man, and I don't know how I got through my business; every minute expecting to hear the outcry from the dead man's room.

"Mr. Edwards had an appointment, he said—nothing good, you may be sure—they were a rake-helly set—saving your presence. Neither he nor my lord had lost, I believe, anything to signify to one another; and my lord, your father, made no difficulty about his going away, but began to call again for Mr. Beauclerc, and to curse him—as a half-drunk man will, making a power of noise; and, 'where's he gone to?' and, 'where's his room?' and, '—him, he shall play, or fight me.' You see, sir, he had lost right and left that time, and was an angry man, and the liquor made him half mad; and I don't think he knew rightly what he was doing. And out on the lobby with him swearing he should give him his revenge, or he'd know the reason why.

"'Where's Mr. Beauclerc's room?' he shouts to me, as if he'd strike me; I did not care a rush about that, but I was afraid to say—it stuck in my throat like—and I stared at Mr. Archer; and he calls to the chamber-maid, that was going up stairs, 'Where does Mr. Beauclerc lie?' and she, knowing him, says at once, 'the Flower de luce,' and pointed to the room; and with that, my lord staggers up to the door, with his drawn sword in hand, bawling on him to come out, and fumbling with the pin, he could not open it; so he knocked it open with a kick, and in with him, and Mr. Archer at his elbow, soothing him like; and I, I don't know how—behind him.

"By this time he had worked himself into a mad passion, and says he, 'Curse your foxing—if you won't play like a man, you may die like a dog.' I think 'twas them words ruined him, the chamber-maid heard them outside; and he struck Mr. Beauclerc half-a-dozen blows with the side of the small-sword across the body, here and there, quite unsteady; and, 'hold, my lord, you've hurt him,' cries Mr. Archer, as loud as he could cry. 'Put up your sword for Heaven's sake,' and he makes a sort of scuffle with my lord, in a friendly way, to disarm him, and push him away, 'and throw down the coverlet and see where he's wounded,' says he to me; and so I did, and there was a great pool of blood—we knew all about that—and my lord looked shocked when he seen it. 'I did not mean that,' says my lord; 'but,' says he, with a sulky curse, 'he's well served.'

"I don't know whether Glascock was in the room or not all this while, maybe he was; at any rate, he swore to it afterwards; but you have read the trial, I warrant. The room was soon full of people. The dead man was still warm—'twas well for us. So they raised him up; and one was for trying one thing, and another another; and my lord was sitting stupid-like all this time by the wall; and up he gets, and says he, 'I hope he's not dead, but if he be, upon my honour, 'tis an accident—no more. I call Heaven to witness, and the persons who are now present, and pledge my sacred honour, as a peer, I meant no more than a blow or two.'

"'You hear, gentlemen, what my lord says, he meant only a blow or two, and not to take his life,' cries Mr. Archer.

"So my lord repeats it again, cursing and swearing, like St. Peter in the judgment-hall.

"So, as nobody was meddling with my lord, out he goes, intending, I suppose, to get away altogether, if he could. But Mr. Underwood missed him, and he says, 'Gentlemen, where's my Lord Dnoran, we must not suffer him to depart?' and he followed him—two or three others going along with him, and they met him with his hat and cloak on, in the lobby, and he says, stepping between him and the stairs,—

"My lord, you must not go, until we see how this matter ends.'

"So you know the rest—how that business ended, at least for him."

"And you are that very Zekiel Irons who was a witness on the trial?" said Mervyn, with a peculiar look of fear and loathing fixed on him.

"The same," said Irons, doggedly; and after a pause, "but I swore to very little; and all I said was true—though it wasn't the whole truth. Look to the trial, sir, and you'll see 'twas Mr. Archer and Glascock that swore home against my lord—not I. And I don't think myself, Glascock was in the room at all when it happened—so I don't."

"And where is that wretch Glascock, and that double murderer, Archer; where is he?"

"Under ground, this many a day. Listen: Mr. Archer went up to London, and he was staying at the Hummums, and Glascock agreed with me to leave the 'Pied Horso.' We were both uneasy, and planned to go up to London together; and what does he do—nothing less would serve him—but he writes a sort of letter, asking money of Mr. Archer under a threat. This, you know, was after the trial. Well, there came no answer; but, after a while—all on a sudden—Mr. Archer arrived himself at the 'Pied Horse;' I did not know then that Glascock had writ to him—for he meant to keep whatever he might get to himself. 'So,' says Mr. Archer to me, meeting me by the pump in the stable-yard, 'that was a clever letter you and Glascock wrote to me in town.'

"So I told him 'twas the first I heard of it.

"'Why,' says he, 'do you mean to tell me you don't want money?'

"I don't know why it was, but a sort of a turn came over me, and I said, 'no.'

"'Well,' says he, 'I'm going to sell a horse, and I expect to be paid to-morrow; you and Glascock must wait for me outside—I think the name of the village was Merton—I'm not sure, for I never seen it before or since—' and I'll give you some money then.'

"'I'll have none,' says I.

" 'What, no money?' says he. 'Come, come.'

" 'I tell you, sir, I'll have none,' says I. Something, you see, came over me, and I was more determined than ever. I was always afraid of him, but I feared him like Beelzebub now. I've had enough of your money, sir; and I tell you what, Mr. Archer, I think 'tis best to end our dealings, and I'd rather, if you please, sir, never trouble you more.'

" 'You're a queer dog,' says he, with his eye fast on me, and musing for a while—as if he could see into my brain, and was diverted by what he found, there;—'you're a queer dog, Irons. Glascock knows the world better, you see; and as you and he are going up to London together, and I must give the poor devil a lift, I'll meet you at the other side of Merton, beyond the quarry—you know the moor—on Friday evening, after dark—say seven o'clock—we must be quiet, you know, or people will be talking.'

" Well, sir, we met him, sure enough, at the time and place."

---

CHAPTER LXIX.

IN WHICH THE APPARITION OF MR. IRONS IS SWALLOWED IN DARKNESS.

" 'TWAS a darkish night—very little moon—and he made us turn off the road, into the moor—black and ugly it looked, stretching away four or five miles, all heath and black peat, stretches of little broken hillocks, and a pool or tarn every now and again. An' he kept looking back towards the road, and not a word out of him. Well, I did not like meeting him at all if I could help it, but I was in dread of him; and I thought he might suppose I was plotting mischief if I refused. So I made up my mind to do as he bid me for the nonce, and then have done with him.

"By this time we were in or about a mile from the road, and we got over a low rising ground, and back nor forward, nor no way could we see anything but the moor; and I stopped all of a sudden, and says I, 'we're far enough, I'll go no further.'

"'Good,' says Mr. Archer; 'but let's go yonder, where the stones are—we can sit as we talk—for I'm tired.'

"There was half-a-dozen white stones there by the side of one of these black tarns. We none of us talked much on that walk over the moor. We had enough to think of, each of us, I dare say.

"'This will do,' says Mr. Archer, stopping beside the pool; but he did not sit, though the stones were there. 'Now, Glascock, here I am, with the price of my horse in my pocket, what do you want?'

"Well, when it came to the point so sudden, Glascock looked a bit shy, and hung his head, and rowled his shoulders, and shuffled his feet a bit, thinking what he'd say.

"'Hang it, man; what are you afraid of! we're friends,' says Mr. Archer, cheerfully.

"'Surely, sir,' says Glascock, 'I do not mean aught else.'

"And with that Mr. Archer laughed, and says he—

"'Come—you beat about the bush—let's hear your mind.'

"'Well, sir, 'tis in my letter,' says he.

"'Ah, Glascock,' says he, 'that's a threatening letter. I did not think you'd serve me so. Well, needs must when the devil drives.' And he laughed again, and shrugs up his shoulders, and says he, putting his hand in his pocket, 'there's sixty pounds left; 'tis all I have; come be modest—what do you say?'

"'You got a lot of gold off Mr. Beauclerc,' says Glascock.

"'Not a doit more than I wanted,' says he, laughing again. 'And who, pray, had a better right—did not I murder him?'

"His talk and his laughing frightened me more and more.

"'Well, I stood to you then, sir; didn't I?' says Glascock.

"Heart of oak, sir—true as steel; and now how much do you want? Remember 'tis all I have—and I out at elbows; and here's my friend Irons, too—eh?"

"I want nothing, and I'll take nothing," says I; "not a shilling—not a halfpenny." You see there was something told me no good would come of it, and I was frightened besides.

"What! you won't go in for a share, Irons?" says he.

"No; 'tis your money, sir—I've no right to a sixpence—and I won't have it," says I; "and there's an end."

"Well, Glascock, what say you?—you hear Irons."

"Let Irons speak for himself—he's nothing to me. You should have considered me when all that money was taken from Mr. Beaucherc—one done as much as another—and if 'twas no more than holding my tongue, still 'tis worth a deal to you."

"I don't deny—a deal—everything. Come—there's sixty pounds here—but, mark, 'tis all I have—how much?"

"I'll have thirty, and I'll take no less," says Glascock, surly enough.

"Thirty! 'tis a good deal—but all considered, perhaps not too much," says Mr. Archer.

"And with that he took his right hand from his breeches' pocket, and shot him through the heart with a pistol.

"Neither word, nor stir, nor groan, did Glascock make; but with a sort of a jerk, flat on his back he fell, with his head on the verge of the tarn.

"I believe I said something—I don't know—I was almost as dead as himself—for I did not think anything that bad was near at all.

"Come, Irons—what ails you—steady, sir—lend me a hand, and you'll take no harm."

"He had the pistol he discharged in his left hand by this time, and a loaded one in his right.

"'Tis his own act, Irons. I did not want it; but I'll protect myself, and won't hold my life on ransom, at the hands of a Jew or a Judas,' said he, smiling through his black hair, as white as a tombstone.

" 'I am neither,' says I.

" 'I know it,' says he; 'and so you're here, and he there.'

" 'Well, 'tis over now, I suppose,' says I. I was thinking of making off.

" 'Don't go yet,' says he, like a man asking a favour; but he lifted the pistol an inch or two, with a jerk of his wrist, 'you must help me to hide away this dead fool.'

" Well, sir, we had three or four hours' cold work of it—we tied stones in his clothes, and sunk him close under the bank, and walled him over with more. 'Twas no light job, I can tell you, the water near four feet deep, though 'twas a dry season; and then we slipped out a handsome slice of the bank over him; and making him all smooth we left him to take his chance; and I never heard any talk of a body being found there; and I suppose he's now where we left him."

And Irons groaned.

" So we returned silent and tired enough, and I in mortal fear of him. But he designed me no hurt. There's luckily some risk in making away with a fellow, and 'tisn't done by any but a fool without good cause; and when we got on the road again, I took the London road, and he turned his back on me, and I don't know where he went; but no doubt his plans were well shaped.

" Now, you see, Glascock's dead, and can't tell tales no more nor Mr. Beaucherc, and Dr. Sturk's a dead man too, you may say; and I think he knew—that is—brought to mind somewhat. He lay, you see, on the night Mr. Beaucherc lost his life, in a sort of a dressing-room, off his chamber, and the door was open; but he was bad with a fall he had, and his arm in splints, and he under laudanum—in a trance-like—and on the inquest he could tell nothing; but I think he remembered something more or less concerning it after." And Mr. Irons took a turn, and came back very close to Mervyn, and said very gently, "and I think Charles Archer murdered him."

"Then Charles Archer has been in Dublin, perhaps in Chapelizod, within the last few months," exclaimed Mervyn, in a sort of agony.

"I didn't say so," answered Irons. "I've told you the truth—'tis the truth—but there's no catching a ghost—and who'd believe my story? and them things is so long ago. And suppose I make a clean breast of it, and that I could bring you face to face with him, the world would not believe my tale, and I'd then be a lost man, one way or another—no one, mayhap, could tell how—I'd lose my life before a year, and all the world could not save me."

"Perhaps—perhaps Charles Nutter's the man; and Mr. Dangerfield knows something of him," cried Mervyn.

Irons made no answer, but sat quite silent for some seconds, by the fire, the living image of apathy.

"If you name me, or blab one word I told you, I hold my peace for ever," said he, slowly, with a quiet oath, but very pale, and how blue his chin looked—how grim his smile, with his face so shiny, and his eyelids closed. "You're to suppose, sir, 'tis possible Mr. Dangerfield has a guess at him. Well, he's a clever man, and knows how to put this and that together; and has been kind to Dr. Sturk and his family. He's a good man, you know; and he's a long-headed gentleman, they say; and if he takes a thing in hand, he'll be as like as another to bring it about. But, sink or swim, my mind is nigh made up. Charles Archer, wherever he is, will not like my going—he'll sniff danger in the wind, sir. I could not stay—he'd have had me—you see, body and soul. 'Twas time for me to go—and go or stay, I see nothing but bad before me. 'Twas an evil day I ever saw his face; and 'twould be better for me to have a cast for my life at any rate, and that I'm nigh-hand resolved on; only, you see, my heart misgives me—and that's how it is. I can't quite make up my mind."

For a little while Mervyn stood in an agony of irresolution. I'm sure I cannot understand all he felt, having never been, thank Heaven! in a like situation. I only know how much depended on it, and I don't wonder that for some seconds he thought of arresting that lank, pale, sinister figure by the fire, and denouncing him as, by his own confession, an accessory to the murder of Beaucherc. The thought that he would slip through his fingers, and the clue to vindication, fortune, and happiness, be for ever lost, was altogether so dreadful that we must excuse his forgetting for a moment his promise, and dismissing patience, and even policy, from his thoughts.

But 'twas a transitory temptation only, and common sense seconded honour. For he was persuaded that whatever likelihood there was of leading Irons to the critical point, there was none of driving him thither; and that Irons, once restive and impracticable, all his hopes would fall to the ground.

"I am going," said Irons, with quiet abruptness; "and right glad the storm's up still," he added, in a haggard rumination, and with a strange smile of suffering. "In dark an' storm—curse him!—I see his face everywhere. I don't know how he's got this hold over me;" and he cursed him again, and groaned dismally. "A night like this is my chance—and so here goes."

"Remember, for Heaven's sake, remember," said Mervyn, with agonized urgency, as he followed him with a light along the passage to the back-door.

Irons made no answer; and walking straight on, without turning his head, only lifted his hand with a movement backward, like a man who silently warns another from danger.

So Irons went forth into the night and the roaring storm, dark and alone, like an evil spirit into desert places; and Mervyn barred the door after him, and returned to the cedar parlour, and remained there alone and long in profound and not unnatural agitation.

---

CHAPTER LXX.

CONCERNING A CERTAIN GENTLEMAN WITH A BLACK PATCH
OVER HIS EYE, WHO MADE SOME VISITS WITH A LADY IN CHAPELIZOD AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD.

IN the morning, though the wind had somewhat gone down, 'twas still dismal and wild enough ; and, to the consternation of poor Mrs. Macnamara, as she sat alone in her window after breakfast, Miss Mag and the Major being both abroad, a hackney-coach drew up at the door, which stood open. The maid was on the step, cheapening fish with a virulent lady who had a sieve-full to dispose of.

A gentleman, with a large, unwholesome face, and a patch over one eye, popped his unpleasant countenance, black wig, and three-cocked hat, out of the window, and called to the coachman to let him out.

Forth he came, somewhat slovenly, his coat not over-well brushed, having in his hand a small trunk, covered with gilt crimson leather, very dingy, and somewhat ceremoniously assisted a lady to alight. This dame, as she stepped with a long leg, in a black silk stocking, to the ground, swept the front windows of the house from under her velvet hood with a sharp and evil glance ; and, in fact, she was Mistress Mary Matchwell.

As she beheld her, poor Mrs. Mack's heart fluttered up to her mouth, and then dropped, with a dreadful plump, into the pit of her stomach. The dingy, dismal gentleman, swinging the red trunk in his hand, swaggered lazily back and forward to stretch his legs over the pavement, and air his large cadaverous countenance, and sniff the village breezes.

Mistress Matchwell in the meantime, exchanging a passing word with the servant, gathered her rustling silks about her, and with a few long steps noiselessly mounted the narrow stairs, and stood, sallow and terrible in her sables, before the poor gentleman.

"See," says Mary Matchwell, "I must have twenty pounds—but don't take on. You must make an effort, my dear—'tis the last. Come, don't be cast down. I'll pay you when I come to my property, in three weeks' time; but law expenses must be paid, and the money I must have."

Hereupon Mrs. Mack clasped her hands together in an agony, and "set up the pipes."

M. M. was like to lose patience, and when she did, she looked most feloniously, and in a way that made poor, soft Mrs. Mack quiver.

"'Tis but twenty pounds, woman," she said, sternly. "Hub-bub-bub-boo-hoo-hoo," blubbered the fat and miserable Mrs. Macnamara. "It will be all about—I may as well tell it myself. I'm ruined! My Venetian lace—my watch—the brocade not made up. It won't do. I must tell my brother; and I'd rather go out for a charwoman and starve myself to a skeleton, than try to borrow more money."

Mrs. Matchwell advanced her face towards the widow's tearful countenance, and held her in the spell of her dreadful gaze as a cat does a bird.

Well, this time it ended as heretofore—poor Mrs. Mack gave way. She had not a crown-piece, indeed, that she could call her own; but M. M. was obliging, and let her off for a bill of exchange, the nature of which, to her dying day, the unhappy widow could never comprehend, although it caused her considerable affliction some short time subsequently.

Away went Mary Matchwell with her prize, leaving an odour of brandy behind her. Her dingy and sinister squire performed his clumsy courtesies, and without looking to the right or the left, climbed into the coach after her, with his red trunk in his hand; and the vehicle was again in motion, and jingling on at a fair pace in the direction of Nutter's house, The Mills, where her last visit had ended so tragically.

Now, it so happened that just as this coach, with its sombre occupants, drew up at The Mills, Doctor Toole was standing on the steps, giving Moggy a parting injunction, after his wont; for poor little Mrs. Nutter had been thrown into a new paroxysm by the dreadful tidings of her Charlie's death, and was now lying on her bed, and bathing the pillow in her tears.

"Is this the tenement called The Mills, formerly in the occupation of the late Charles Nutter—eh?" demanded the gentleman, thrusting his face from the window, before the coachman had got to the door.

"It is, sir," replied Toole, putting Moggy aside, and suspecting, he could not tell what, amiss. "But Mrs. Nutter is very far from well, sir; in fact, in her bed-chamber, sir, and laid upon her bed."

"Mrs. Nutter's here, sir," said the man phlegmatically. He had just got out on the ground before the door, and extended his hand toward Mary Matchwell, whom he assisted to alight. "This is Mrs. Nutter, relict of the late Charles Nutter, of The Mills, near Knockmaroon, in the parish of Chapelizod."

"At your service, sir," said Mary Matchwell, dropping a demure, scornful courtesy, and preparing to sail by him.

"Not so fast, m<sup>r</sup>am, if you please," said Toole, astonished, but still sternly and promptly enough. "In with you, Moggy, and bar the kitchen door."

And shoving the maid back, he swung the door to, with a slam. He was barely in time, and Mary Matchwell, baffled and pale, confronted the Doctor, with the devil gleaming from her face.

"Who are you, man, that dare shut my own door in my face?" said the beldame.

"Toole's my name, madam," said the little Doctor, with a lofty look and a bow. "I have the honour to attend here in a professional capacity."

"Ho! a village attorney," cried the fortune-teller, plainly without having consulted the cards or the planets. "Well, sir, you'd better stand aside, for I'm the Widow Nutter, and this is my house; and burn me, but, one way or another, in I'll get."

"You'd do well to avoid a trespass, ma'am, and better to abstain from house-breaking; and you may hammer at the knocker till you're tired, but they'll not let you in," rejoined Toole. "And as to you being the Widow Nutter, ma'am, that is widow of poor Charles Nutter, lately found drowned, I'll be glad to know ma'am, how you make that out."

"Stay, madam, by your leave," said the cadaverous, large-faced man, interposing. "We are here, sir, to claim possession of this tenement and the appurtenances, as also of all the money, furniture, and other chattels whatsoever of the late Charles Nutter; and being denied admission, we shall then serve certain cautionary and other notices, in such a manner as the Court will, under the circumstances, and in your presence, being, by your admission, the attorney of Sarah Hearty, calling herself Nutter"—

"I did not say I was," said Toole, with a little toss of his chin. The gentleman's large face here assumed a cunning leer.

"Well, we have our thoughts about that, sir," he said. "But by your leave, we'll knock at the hall-door."

"I tell you what, sir," said Toole, who had no reliance upon the wisdom of the female garrison, and had serious misgivings lest at the first stout summons the maids should open the door, and the ill-favoured pair establish themselves in occupation of poor Mrs. Nutter's domicile, "I'll not object to the notices being received. There's the servant up at the window there—but you must not make a noise: Mrs. Nutter, poor woman, is sick and hypochondriac, and can't bear a noise; but I'll permit the services of the notices, because, you see, we can afford to snap our fingers at them. I say, Moggy, open a bit of that window, and take in the papers that this gentleman will hand you. There, sir,—on the end of your cane, if you please—very good."

"'Twill do, she has them. Thank you, miss," said the legal practitioner with a grin. "Now ma'am, we'd best go to the Prerogative Court."

Mary Matchwell laughed one of her pale malevolent laughs up at the maid in the window, who stood there with the papers in her hand, in a sort of horror.

"Never mind," said Mary Matchwell, to herself, and, getting swiftly into the coach, she gleamed another ugly smile up at the window of The Mills, as she adjusted her black attire.

"To the Prerogative Court," said the attorney to the coachman.

"In that house I'll lie to-night," said Mary Matchwell, with a terrible mildness, as they drove away, still glancing back upon it, with her peculiar smile; and then she leaned back, with a sneer of superiority on her pallid features, and the dismal fatigue of the spirit that rests not, looked savagely out from the deep, haggard windows of her eyes.

When Toole saw the vehicle fairly off, you may be sure he did not lose time in getting into the house, and there conning over the papers, which puzzled him unspeakably.

---

CHAPTER LXXI.

IN WHICH DOCTOR TOOLE, IN HIS BOOTS, VISITS MR. GAMBLE, AND SEES AN UGLY CLIENT OF THAT GENTLEMAN'S; AND SOMETHING CROSSES AN EMPTY ROOM.

"HERE'S a conspiracy with a vengeance!" muttered Toole, "if a body could only make head or tail of it. Widow!—Eh!—we'll see: why, she's like no woman ever I saw. Mrs. Nutter, forsooth;" and he could not forbear laughing at the conceit. "Poor Charles? 'tis ridiculous—though, upon my life, I don't like it. It's just possible it may be all as true as gospel—they're the most devilish looking pair I've seen out of the dock—curse them—for many a day. I would not wonder if they were robbers. The widow looks consumedly like a man in petticoats—hey!—devilish like. I think I'll send Moran and Brien up to sleep to-night in the house. But, hang it! if they were, they would not come out in the daytime to give an alarm. Hollo! Moggy, throw me out one of them papers till I see what it's about."

So he conned over the notice which provoked him, for he could not half understand it, and he was very curious.

"Well, keep it safe, Moggy," said he. "H'm—it does look like law business, after all, and I believe it is. No—they're not housebreakers, but robbers of another stamp—and a worse, I'll take my davy."

"See," said he, as a thought struck him, "throw me down both of them papers again—there's a good girl. They ought to be looked after, I dare say, and I'll see the poor master's attorney to-day, d'ye mind? and we'll put our heads together—and, that's right—relict indeed!"

And, with a solemn injunction to keep doors locked and windows fast, and a nod and a wave of his hand to Mistress Moggy, and muttering half a sentence or an oath to himself, he buttoned his pocket over the legal documents, and strutted down to the village, where his nag awaited him saddled, and Jimmie walking him up and down before the Doctor's hall-door.

Toole was bound upon a melancholy mission that morning. But, though properly a minister of life, a doctor is also conversant with death, and inured to the sight of familiar faces in that remarkable disguise. So he spurred away with more coolness, though not less regret, than another man, to throw what light he could upon the subject of the inquest which was to sit upon the body of poor Charles Nutter.

The little doctor on his way to Ringsend, without the necessity of diverging to the right or left, drew bridle at the door of Mr. Luke Gamble, on the Blind Quay, attorney to the late Charles Nutter, and, jumping to the ground, delivered a rattling summons thereupon.

It was a dusty, dreary, wainscotted old house—with doors broken through the partition walls—the floors not all of a level—joined by steps up and down—and having three great stair-cases, that made it confusing. Through the windows it was not easy to see, such a fantastic mapping of thick dust and dirt coated the glass.

Luke Gamble, like the house, had seen better days. It was not his fault; but an absconding partner had well nigh been his ruin: and, though he paid their liabilities, it was with a strain, and left him a poor man, shattered his connexion, and made the house too large by a great deal for his business.

Doctor Toole came into the clerks' room, and was ushered by one of these gentlemen through an empty chamber into the attorney's sanctum. Up two steps stumbled the physician, cursing the house for a place where a gentleman was so much more likely to break his neck than fast, and found old Gamble in his velvet cap and dressing gown, in conference with a long-faced, pale, and pock-marked elderly man, squinting unpleasantly under a black wig, who was narrating something slowly, and with effort, while the attorney, with his spectacles on his nose, was making notes. The speaker ceased abruptly, and turned his lean, pallid visage and jealous, oblique eyes on the intruder.

Luke Gamble looked embarrassed, and shot one devilish angry glance at his clerk, and then made Doctor Toole very welcome.

When Toole had ended his narrative, and the attorney read the notices through, Mr. Gamble's countenance brightened, and darkened and brightened again, and, with a very significant look, he said to the pale, unpleasant face, pitted with small-pox—

"M. M.," and nodded.

"And who's M. M., pray?" inquired Toole.

"When were these notices served, Doctor?" asked Mr. Gamble.

"Not an hour ago; but, I say, who the plague's M. M.?" answered Toole.

"M. M." repeated the attorney, smiling grimly on the backs of the notices that lay on the table; "why there's many queer things to be heard of M. M.; and the town, and the country, too, for that matter, is like to know a good deal more of her before long; and who served them—a process-server, or who?"

"Why, a fat, broad, bull-necked rascal, with a double chin, and a great round face, the colour of a bad suet-dumplin', and a black patch over his eye," answered Toole.

"Very like—was he alone?" said Gamble.

"No—a long, sly she-devil in black, that looked as if she'd cut your windpipe, like a cat in the dark, as pale as paper, and mighty large, black, hollow eyes."

"Ay—that's it," said Gamble, who, during this dialogue, had thrown his morning-gown over the back of the chair, and got on his coat, and opened a little press in the wall, from which he took his wig, and so completed his toilet.

"That's it?" repeated Toole, "what's it?—what's what?"

"Why 'tis David O'Regan—dirty Davy, as we call him. I never knew him yet in an honest case; and the woman's M. M."

"Hey! to be sure—a woman—I know—I remember;" and he was on the point of breaking out with poor Mrs. Macnamara's secret, but recovered in time. "That's the she fortune-teller, the witch, M. M., Mary Matchwell; 'twas one of her printed cards, you know, was found lying in Sturk's blood. Dr. Sturk, you remember, that they issued the warrant for, against our poor friend, you know."

"Ay, ay—poor Charles—poor Nutter. Are you going to the inquest?" said Gamble; and, on a sudden, stopped short, with a look of great fear, and a little beckon of his hand forward, as if he had seen something.

There was that in Gamble's change of countenance which startled Toole, who, seeing that his glance was directed through an open door at the other end of the room, skipped from his chair, and peeped through it. There was nothing, however, visible but a tenebrose and empty passage.

"What did you see—eh? What frightens you?" said Toole. "One would think you saw Nutter—like—like."

Gamble looked horribly perturbed at these words.

"Shut it," said he, nearing the door, on which Toole's hand rested. Toole took another peep, and did so.

"Why, there's nothing there—like—like the women down at the Mills there," continued the Doctor.

"What about the women?" inquired Gamble, not seeming to know very well what he was saying, agitated still—perhaps, intending to keep Toole talking.

"Why, the women—the maids, you know—poor Nutter's servants, down at the Mills. They swear he walks the house, and they'll have it they saw him last night."

"Pish! sir—'tis all conceit and vapours—women's fancies—a plague o' them all. And where's poor Mrs. Nutter?" said Gamble, clapping on his cocked-hat, and taking his cane, and stuffing two or three bundles of law papers into his coat pockets.

"At home—at the Mills. She slept at the village, and so missed the ghost. The Macnamaras have been mighty kind. But when the news was told her this morning, poor thing, she would not stay, and went home; and there she is, poor little soul, breaking her heart."

Mr. Gamble was not ceremonious; so he just threw a cursory and anxious glance round the room, clapped his hands on his coat pockets, making a bunch of keys ring somewhere deep in their caverns. And all being right—

"Come along, gentlemen," says he, "I'm going to lock the door; and, without looking behind him, he bolted forth abstractedly into his dusty ante-room.

"Get your cloak about you, sir—remember your cough, you know—the air of the streets is sharp," said he, with a sly wink, to his ugly client, who hastily took the hint.

"Is that coach at the door!" bawled Gamble to his clerks in the next room, while he locked the door of his own snuggerly behind him; and being satisfied it was so, he conducted the party out by a side door, avoiding the clerks' room, and so down stairs.

"Drive to the Courts," said the attorney to the coachman; and that was all Toole learned about it that day. So he mounted his nag, and resumed his journey to Ringsend at a brisk trot.

I suppose, when he turned the key in his door, and dropped it into his breeches' pocket, the gentleman attorney assumed that he had made every thing perfectly safe in his private chamber, though Toole thought he had not looked quite the same again after that sudden change of countenance he had remarked.

Now, it was a darksome day, and the windows of Mr. Gamble's room were so obscured with cobwebs, dust, and dirt, that even on a sunny day they boasted no more than a dim religious light. But on this day a cheerful man would have asked for a pair of candles, to dissipate the twilight and sustain his spirits.

He had not been gone, and the room empty ten minutes, when the door through which he had seemed to look on that unknown something that dismayed him, opened softly—at first a little—then a little more—then came a knock at it—then it opened more, and the dark shape of Charles Nutter, with rigid features and white eye-balls, glided stealthily and crouching into the chamber, and halted at the table, and seemed to read the endorsements of the notices that lay there.

---

CHAPTER LXXII.

HOW A GENTLEMAN PAID A VISIT AT THE BRASS CASTLE, AND THERE READ A PARAGRAPH IN AN OLD NEWSPAPER.

DANGERFIELD was, after his wont, seated at his desk writing letters, after his early breakfast, with his neatly-labelled accounts at his elbow. He had just sealed the last of half-a-dozen letters, when the maid opened his parlour-door, and told him that a gentleman was at the hall-step, who wished to see him.

Dangerfield looked up with a quick glance—

“Eh?—to be sure. Show him in.”

And in a few seconds more, Mr. Mervyn, his countenance more than usually pale and sad, entered the room.

Dangerfield rose with a prompt smile, and advanced with his hand extended, which, as a matter of form, rather than of cordiality, his visitor took, coldly enough, in his.

“Happy to see you here, Mervyn—pray, take a chair—a charming morning for a turn by the river, sir.”

“I have taken the liberty of visiting you, Mr. Dangerfield”——

“Your visit, sir, I esteem an honour,” interposed the lord of the Brass Castle.

A slight and ceremonious bow from Mervyn, who continued—

“For the purpose of asking you directly and plainly for some light upon a matter in which it is in the highest degree important I should be informed.”

“You may command me, Mr. Mervyn,” said Dangerfield, crossing his legs, throwing himself back, and adjusting himself to attention.

Mervyn fixed his dark eyes full and sternly upon that white and enigmatical face, with its round glass eyes and silver setting, and those delicate lines of scorn he had never observed before, traced about the mouth and nostril.

"Then, sir, I venture to ask you for all you can disclose or relate about one Charles Archer."

Dangerfield cocked his head on one side, quizzically, and smiled the faintest imaginable cynical smile.

"I can't disclose anything, for the gentleman never told me his secrets; but all I can relate is heartily at your service."

"Can you point him out, sir?" asked Mervyn, a little less sternly, for he saw no traces of a guilty knowledge in the severe countenance, and prompt, unembarrassed manner of the gentleman who leaned back in his chair, with the clear bright light full on him, and his legs crossed so carelessly.

Dangerfield smiled, shook his head gently, and shrugged his shoulders the least thing in the world.

"Don't you know him, sir?" demanded Mervyn.

"Why, sir," said Dangerfield, with his chin a little elevated, and the tips of his fingers all brought together, and his elbows resting easily upon the arms of his chair, "Charles Archer, perhaps you're not aware, was not exactly the most reputable acquaintance in the world; and my knowledge of him was very slight indeed—wholly accidental—and of very short duration."

"But you do know him?" pursued Mervyn.

"I did, sir, though very slightly," answered Dangerfield.

"And I'm given to understand, sir, he's to be found occasionally in this town?" continued his visiter.

"There's just one man who sees him, and that's the parish clerk—what's his name?—Zekiel Irons—he sees him. Suppose we send down to his house, and fetch him here, and learn all about it?" said Dangerfield, who seemed mightily tickled by the whole thing.

"He left the town, sir, last night; and I've reason to suspect, with a resolution of returning no more. And I must speak plainly, Mr. Dangerfield, and say, 'tis no subject for trifling—the fame and fortune of a noble family depend on searching out the truth; and I'll lose my life, Mr. Dangerfield, or I'll discover it."

Still, the old cynical, quizzical smile on Dangerfield's white face, who said encouragingly—

“Nobly resolved, sir, upon my honour!”

“And Mr. Dangerfield, if you'll only lay yourself out to help me, with your great knowledge and subtlety—disclosing everything you know or conjecture, and putting me in train to discover the rest—so that I may fully clear this dreadful mystery up—there is no sacrifice of fortune I will not cheerfully make to recompense such immense services, and you may name with confidence your own terms, and think nothing exorbitant.”

For the first time Dangerfield's countenance actually darkened and grew stern, but Mervyn could not discern whether it was with anger or deep thought, and the round spectacles returned his intense gaze with a white reflected sheen, sightless, and meaningless as death.

But the stern mouth opened, and Dangerfield, in his harsh, brief tones, said—

“You speak without reflection, sir, and had nigh made me lose my temper; but I pardon you; you're young, sir, and besides, know probably little or nothing of me. The inducements you're pleased to offer, you may address elsewhere, they are not for me. I shall forget your imprudence and answer frankly any questions, within my knowledge, you please to ask.”

“You mentioned Irons, the clerk, Mr. Dangerfield, and said that he sees Charles Archer. Do you mean it?”

“Why, thus I mean it. He thinks he sees him; but, if he does, upon my honour, he sees a ghost,” and Dangerfield chuckled merrily.

“Pray, Mr. Dangerfield, consider me, and be serious, and in Heaven's name explain,” said Mervyn, speaking, evidently, in suppressed anguish.

“Why, you know—don't you? the poor fellow's not quite right here,” and he tapped the centre of his own towering forehead with the delicate tip of his white middle finger. “I've seen a little of him; he's an angler, so am I; and he showed me the fishing of the river, here, last summer, and often amused me prodigiously. I don't say, mind ye, he's mad, there are many degrees, and he's quite a competent parish clerk. He's only wrong on a point or two, and one of them is Charles Archer. I believe for a while he thought you were he," and Dangerfield laughed his dry, hard chuckle.

"Where, sir, do you suppose Charles Archer is now to be found?" urged Mervyn.

"Why, what remains of him, in Florence," answered Dangerfield.

"You speak sir, as if you thought him dead."

"Think? I know he's dead. I knew him but three weeks, and visited him in his sickness—was in his room half an hour before he died, and attended his funeral," said Dangerfield.

"I implore of you, sir, as you hope for mercy, don't trifle in this matter," cried Mervyn, whose face was white and shining, like that of a man about to swoon under an operation.

"Trifle! What d'ye mean, sir?" barked out Dangerfield, rabidly.

"I mean, sir, this—I've information he's positively living, and can relieve my father's memory from the horrible imputation that rests upon it. You know who I am!"

"Ay, sir, Lord Oastlemallard told me."

"And my life I cheerfully devote to the task of seizing and tracing out the bloody clue of the labyrinth in which I'm lost."

"Good—'tis a pious as well as a prudent resolve," said Dangerfield, with a quiet sneer. "And now, sir, give me leave to say a word. Your information that Charles Archer is living, is not worth the breath of the madman that spoke it, as I'll presently show you. By an odd chance, sir, I required this file of newspapers, last week, to help me in ascertaining the date of Sir Harry Wyatt's marriage. Well, only last night, what should I hit on but this. Will you please to read?"

He had turned over the pages rapidly, and then he stopped at this little piece of news, packed up in a small paragraph at the bottom of a column, and, pointing his finger to it, he slid the volume of newspapers over to Mervyn, who read—

“Died on the 4th of August, of a lingering disease, at his lodgings in Florence, whither he had gone for the improvement of his health, Charles Archer, Esq., a gentleman who some three years since gave an exceeding clear evidence against Lord Dunoran, for the murder of Mr. Beauclerc, and was well known at Newmarket. His funeral, which was private, was attended by several English gentlemen, who were then at Florence.”

Mervyn, deadly pale, with gleaming eyes, and hand laid along his forehead, as if to screen off an insupportable light and concentrate his gaze upon the words, read and re-read these sentences with an agony of scrutiny such as no critic ever yet brought to bear upon a disputed passage in his favorite classic. But there was no possibility of fastening any consolatory interpretation upon the paragraph. It was all too plain and outspoken.

“’Tis possible this may be true—thus much. A Charles Archer is dead, and yet another Charles Archer, the object of my search, still living,” said Mervyn.

“Hey! that didn’t strike me,” said Dangerfield, as much amused as was consistent with moderately good breeding. “But I can quite account, Mr. Mervyn,” he continued, with a sudden change of tone and manner, to something almost of kindness, “for your readiness to entertain any theory not quite destructive of hopes, which, notwithstanding, I fear, rest simply on the visions of that poor hypochondriac, Irons. But, for all that, ’tis just possible that something may strike either you or me in the matter not quite so romantic—hey? But still something — You’ve not told me how the plague, Charles Archer, could possibly have served you. But, on that point, perhaps, we can talk another time. I simply desire to say, that any experience or ability I may possess, are heartily at your service whenever you please to task them, as my good wishes are already.”

So, stunned, and like a man walking in a dream—all his hopes shivered about his feet—Mervyn walked through the door of the little parlour in the Brass Castle, and Dangerfield, accompanying him to the little gate which gave admission from the high-road to that tenement, dismissed him there, with a bow and a pleasant smile; and, standing for a while, wiry and erect, with his hands in his pockets, he followed him, as he paced dejectedly away, with the same peculiar smile.

When he was out of sight, Dangerfield returned to his parlour, smiling all the way, and stood on the hearthrug, with his back to the fire. When he was alone, a shadow came over his face, and he looked down on the fringe with a thoughtful scowl—his hands behind his back—and began adjusting and smoothing it with the toe of his shoe.

"Sot, fool, and poltroon—triple qualification for mischief—I don't know why he still lives. Irons—a new vista opens, and this d——d young man!" All this was not, as we sometimes read, "mentally ejaculated," but quite literally muttered, as I believe every one at times mutters to himself. "Charles Archer living—Charles Archer dead—or, as I sometimes think, neither one nor t'other quite—half man, half corpse—a vampire—there is no rest for thee: no sabbath in the days of thy work. Blood—blood—blood—'tis tiresome. Why should I be a slave to these d——d secrets. I don't think 'tis my judgment, so much as the devil that holds me here. Irons has more brains than I—instinct—calculation—which is oftener right? Miss Gertrude Chatterworth, a mere whim, I think I understand her game too. I'll deal with that to-morrow. I'll send Daxon the account, vouchers, and cheque for Lord Castle-mallard—tell Smith to sell my horses, and, by the next packet—hey!" and he kissed his hand, with an odd smirk, like a gentleman making his adieux, "and so leave those who court the acquaintance of Charles Archer, to find him out, and catch their Tartar how they may."

CHAPTER LXXIII.

RELATING HOW THE CASTLE WAS TAKEN, AND HOW MISTRESS
MOGGY TOOK HEART OF GRACE.

THAT evening there came to the door of the Mills, a damsel, with a wide basket on her arm, the covering of which being removed, a goodly show of laces, caps, fans, washballs, buckles, and other attractions, came out like a parterre of flowers, with such a glow as dazzled the eyes of Moggy, at the study window.

"Would you plaze to want any, my lady?" inquired the pedlar.

Moggy thought they were, perhaps, a little bit too fine for her purse, but she could not forbear longing and looking, and asking the prices of this bit of finery and that, at the window; and she called Betty, and the two maids conned over the whole contents of the basket.

At last she made an offer for an irresistible stay-hook of pinckbeck, set with half-a-dozen resplendent jewels of cut glass, and after considerable chaffering, they came at last to terms, and Moggy ran out to the kitchen for her money, which lay in a brass snuff-box, in a pewter goblet, on the dresser.

As she was counting her coin, and putting back what she did not want, the latch of the kitchen door was lifted from without, and the door itself, pushed and shaken. The door was bolted and locked on the inside, in accordance with Doctor Toole's solemn injunction; and there was no attempt to use violence. But a brisk knocking began thereat; and Moggy, encouraged by hearing the voices of Betty and the vender of splendours at the little parlour window, and also by the amber sunlight on the rustling ivy leaves, and the loud evening gossip of the sparrows, took heart of grace, and demanded shrilly—

"Who's there?"

A whining beggar's voice asked admission.

"But you can't come in, for the house is shut up for the night," replied the cook.

"But 'tis a message for the mistress I have," answered the applicant.

"Come in the morning, my good man," said she, "for sorrow a foot you'll put inside the house to-night."

"An' that's what I'm to tell them that sent me."

"Neither more nor less," replied she.

And so she heard a heavy foot clank along the pavement, and she tried to catch a glance of the retreating figure, but she could not, though she laid her cheek against the window-pane. However, she heard him whistling as he went, which gave her a better opinion of him, and she thought she heard the road gate shut after him.

So feeling relieved, and with a great sigh, she counted her money over; and answering Betty's shrill summons to the study, as the woman was in haste, with a "Coming, coming this minute," she replaced her treasure, and got swiftly into poor Charles Nutter's little chamber.

"'Tis growing late," said the dealer from without, "and I darn't be on the road after dark. Gi' me my money, good girl; and here, take your stay-hook."

And so saying, she looked a little puzzled up and down, as not well knowing how they were to make their exchange.

"Here," says Moggy, "give it in here." And removing the fastening, she shoved the window up a little bit. "Hould it, Betty; hould it up," said she. And in came the woman's hard, brown hand, palm open, for her money, and the other containing the jewel, after which the vain soul of Moggy lusted.

"That'll do," said she; and crying shrilly, "Give us a lift, sweetheart," in a twinkling she shoved the window up, at the same time kneeling, with a spring, upon the sill, and getting her long leg into the room, with her shoulder under the window-sash, her foot firmly planted on the floor, and her face and head in the apartment. Almost at the same instant she was followed by an ill-looking fellow, buttoned up in a surtout, whose stature seemed enormous, and at sight of whom the two women shrieked as if soul and body were parting.

The lady was now quite in the room, and standing upright showed the tall shape and stern lineaments of Mary Matchwell. And as she stood she laughed a sort of shuddering laugh, like a person who has just had a plunge in cold water.

"Stop that noise," said she, recognising Betty, who recognised her with unspeakable terror. "I'm the lady that came here, you know, some months ago, with Mrs. Macnamara; and I'm Mrs. Nutter, which the woman up-stairs is not. I'm Mrs. Nutter, and you're my servants, do ye mind? and I'll act a fair mistress by you, if you do me honest service. Open the hall-door," she said to the man, who was by this time also in the room. And forth he went to do her bidding, and a gentleman, who turned out to be that respectable pillar of the law whom Mr. Gamble in the morning had referred to as "Dirty Davy," entered. He was followed by Mrs. Mary Matchwell's maid, a giggling, cat-like gipsy, with a lot of gaudy finery about her, and a withered, devilment leering in her face; and a hackney-coach drove up to the door, which had conveyed the party from town; and the driver, railing in loud tones, after the manner of this kind in old times, pitched in several trunks, one after the other; and, in fact, it became perfectly clear that M. M. was taking possession. And Betty and Moggy, at their wits' end between terror and bewilderment, were altogether powerless to resist, and could only whimper a protest against the monstrous invasion, while poor little Sally Nutter up-stairs, roused by the wild chorus of strange voices from the lethargy of her grief, and even spurred into active alarm, locked her door, and then hammered with a chair upon the floor, under a maniacal hallucination that she was calling I know not what or whom to the rescue.

Then Dirty Davy read aloud, with due emphasis to the maida, copies, as he stated, of the affidavits sworn to that day by Mistress Mary Matchwell, or as he called her, Mrs. Nutter, relict of the late Charles Nutter, gentleman, of the Mills, in the parish of Chapelizod, barony of Castleknock, and county of Dublin, deposing to her marriage with the said Charles Nutter having been celebrated in the Church of St. Clement Danes, in London, on the 7th April, 1750. And then came a copy of the marriage certificate, and then a statement how, believing that deceased had left no "will" making any disposition of his property, or naming an executor, she applied to the Court of Prerogative for letters of administration to the deceased, which letters would be granted in a few days; and in the meantime the bereaved lady would remain in possession of the house and chattels of her late husband.

All this, of course, was so much "Hebrew-Greek," as honest Father Roach was wont to phrase it, to the scared women. But M. M., fixing them both with her cold and terrible gaze, said quite intelligibly—

"What's your name?"

"Moggy Sullivan, if you please, ma'am."

"And what's yours?"

"Elizabeth—Betty they call me—madam; Elizabeth Burke, if you please, madam."

"Well, then, Moggy Sullivan and Elizabeth Burke, harkee both, while I tell you a thing. I'm mistress here by law, as you've just heard, and you're my servants; and if you so much as wind the jack or move a tea-cup, except as I tell you, I'll find a way to punish you; and if I miss to the value of a pin's head, I'll indict you for a felony, and have you whipt and burnt in the hand—you know what that means. And now, where's Mistress Sarah Harty? for she must pack and away."

"Oh! ma'am, jewel, the poor misthress."

"I'm the mistress, slut."

"Ma'am, dear, she's very bad."

"Where is she?"

"In her room, ma'am," answered Betty, with blubbered cheeks.

"Where are you going, minx?" cried M. M., with a terrible voice and look, and striding toward the door, from which Moggy was about to escape.

Now, Moggy was a sort of heroine, not in the vain matter of beauty, for she had high cheek bones, a snub nose, and her figure had no more waist, or other feminine undulations, than the clock in the hall; but like that useful piece of furniture, presented an oblong parallelogram, unassisted by art; for, except on gala days, these homely maidens never sported hoops. But she was, nevertheless, a heroine of the Amazonian species. She tripped up Pat Morgan, and laid that athlete suddenly on his back, upon the grass plot before the hall door, to his eternal disgrace, when he "offerd" to kiss her, while the fiddler and tambourine-man were playing. She used to wring big boys by the ear; overawe fishwives with her voluble invective; put dangerous dogs to rout with sticks and stones, and evince, in all emergencies, an adventurous spirit and an alacrity for battle.

For her, indeed, as for others, the spell of "M. M.'s" evil eye and witchlike presence was at first too much; but Moggy rallied, and, thus challenged, she turned about at the door and stoutly confronted the intruder.

"Minx, yourself, you black baste, I'm goin' just wherever it plases me best, and I'd like to know who'll stop me; and first, ma'am, by your lave, I'll tell the mistress to lock her door, and keep you and your rake-helly squad at the wrong side of it, and then, ma'am, wherever the fancy takes me next—and that's how it is, and my sarvice to your ladyship."

Off went Moggy, with a leer of defiance and a snap of her fingers, cutting a clumsy caper, and rushed like a mad cow up the stairs, shouting all the way, "Lock your door, ma'am—lock your door."

Growing two or three degrees whiter, M. M., so soon as she recovered herself, glided in pursuit, like the embodiment of an evil spirit, as perhaps, she was, and with a gleam of insanity, or murder, in her eye, which always supervened when her wrath was moved.

The sullen face of the bailiff half lighted up with a cynical grin of expectation, for he saw that both ladies were game, and looked for a spirited encounter. But Dirty Davy spoiled all by interposing his person, and arresting the pursuit of his client and delivering a wheezy expostulation close in her ear.

"Tis a strange thing if I can't do what I will with my own—fine laws i'faith!"

"I only tell you, madam, and if you do, it may embarrass us mightily by-and-bye."

"Au' now, plase your ladyship, will I bring your sarvice to the ladies and gentlemen down in the town, for 'tis there I'm going next," said Moggy popping in at the door, with a mock courtesy, and a pugnacious cock in her eye, and a look altogether so provoking and warlike as almost tempted the bailiff at the door to clap her on the back, and cry, had he spoken Latin, macte virtute puer!

"Catch the slut. You shan't budge—not a foot—hold her," cried M. M. to the bailiff.

"Baugh!" was his answer.

"See now," said Davy, "Madam Nutter's not serious—you're not, ma'am! We don't detain you, mind. The door's open. There's no false imprisonment or duress, mind ye—thanking you all the same Miss for your offer. We won't detain you, ha, ha! Chalk the road for the young lady, Mr. Redmond."

And Davy fell to whisper energetically again in M. M.'s ear.

And Moggy disappeared. Straight down to the town she went, and to the friendly Dr. Toole's house, but he was not expected home from Dublin till morning. Then she had thoughts of going to the barrack, and applying for a company of soldiers, with a cannon, if necessary, to retake the Mills. Then she bethought her of good Dr. Walsingham, but he was too simple to cope, with such seasoned rogues. General Chatterworth was too far away, and not quite the man either, no more than Colonel Stafford; and the young beaux, "them Captains, and the like, 'id only be funnin' me, and knows nothing of law business." So she pitched upon Father Roach.

---

CHAPTER LXXIV.

IN WHICH IRISH MELODY PREVAILS.

Now, Father Roach's domicile was the first house in the Chapel lane, which consisted altogether of two, not being very long. It showed a hall-door, painted green—the national hue—which enclosed, I'm happy to say, not a few of the national virtues, chief among which reigned hospitality. As Moggy turned the corner, and got out of the cold wind under its friendly shelter, she heard a stentorian voice, accompanied by the mellifluous drone of a bagpipe, concluding in a highly decorative style the last verse of the "Colleen Rue."

Respect for this celestial melody, and a desire to hear a little more of what might follow, held Moggy on the steps, with the knocker between her finger and thumb, unwilling to disturb by an unseasonable summons the harmonies from which she was, in fact, separated only by the thickness of the window and its shutter. And when the vocal and instrumental music came to an end together, there broke forth a shrilly chorus of female cackle, some in admiration and some in laughter; and the voice of Father Roach was heard lustily and melodiously ejaculating "More power to you, Pat Mahony!"

As this pleasant party all talked together, and Moggy could not clearly unravel a single sentence, she made up her mind to wait no longer, and knocked with good emphasis, under cover of the uproar.

The maid, who had evidently been in the hall, almost instantaneously opened the door; and with a hasty welcome, full of giggle and excitement, pulled in Moggy by the arm, shutting the door after her; and each damsel asked the other, "An' how are you, and are you elegant?" and shaking her neighbour by both hands. The clerical handmaid, in a galloping whisper in Moggy's ear, told her "'Twas a weddin' party, and such tartin' fun she never see—such a dancin' and singin', and laughin' and funnin'; and she must wait a bit and see the quality," a portion of whom, indeed, were visible as well as overpoweringly audible through the half-open door of the front parlour; "and there was to be a thunderin' fine supper—a round of beef, and two geese, and a tubful of oysters," &c., &c.

Now I must mention that this feast was, in fact, in its own way, more romantically wonderful than that of the celebrated wedding of Camacho the Rich, and one of the many hundred proofs I've met with in the course of my long pilgrimage that the honest prose of every-day life is often ten times more surprising than the unsubstantial fictions of even the best epic poets.

Worthy Father Roach had constituted himself internuncio between Mahony, whom we remember first in his pride of place doing the honors of that feast of Mars in which his "friend" Nuttall was to have carved up the great O'Flaherty on the Fifteen Acres, and next, quantum mutatus ab illo! a helpless but manly captive in the hands of the Dublin bailiffs, and that very Mrs. Elizabeth Woolly, relict and sole executrix of the late Timotheus Woolly, of High street, tailor, &c., &c., who was the cruel cause of his incarceration.

Good Father Roach was of a gallant temperament, and a wheedling tongue, and unfolded before the offended eye of the insulted and vindictive executrix so interesting a picture of "his noble young friend, the victim of circumstance, breaking his manly heart over his follies and misfortunes;" and looking upon her, Mrs. Woolly, afar off, with an eye full of melancholy and awe, tempered with, mayhap, somewhat of romantic gallantry, that he at length persuaded the tremendous "relict" to visit her captive in his dungeon. This she did, in a severe mood, with her attorney, and good Father Roach; and though Mahony's statement was declamatory rather than precise, and was carried on more in the way of an appeal to the "leedy" than as an exposition to the man of law, leaving matters at the end in certainly no clearer state than before he begun, yet the executrix consented to see the imprisoned youth once more, this time dispensing with her attorney's attendance, and content with the protection of the priest, and even upon that, on some subsequent visits, she did not insist.

And so the affair, like one of those medleys of our Irish melodies arranged by poor M. Jullien, starting with a martial air, went off imperceptibly into a pathetic and amorous strain. Father Roach, still officiating as internuncio, found the dowager less and less impracticable, and at length a treaty was happily concluded. The captive came forth to wear henceforward those lighter chains only, which are forged by Hymen and wreathed with roses; and the lady applied to his old promissory notes the torch of love, which in a moment reduced them to ashes. And here, at the hermitage of our jolly Chapelized priest, the treaty was ratified, and the bagpipe and the bridegroom, in tremendous unison, splitting the rafters with "Hymen, Hymen, O Hymenœe!"

In the midst of this festive celebration, his reverence was summoned to the hall. When the holy man had heard Moggy's tale, he scratched his tonsure and looked, I must say, considerably bored.

"Now Moggy, my child, don't you see, acuishla, 'tisen't to me you should 'a' come; I'm here, my dear, engaged," and he dried his moist and rubicund countenance, "in one of the sacred offices iv the Church, the sacrament, my dear, iv"—here Mahony and the piper struck up again in so loud a key in the parlor, that, as Moggy afterwards observed, "they could not

CHAPTER LXXV.

IN WHICH, WHILE THE HARMONY CONTINUES IN FATHER ROACH'S
FRONT PARLOR, A FEW DISCORDS ARE INTRODUCED
ELSEWHERE; AND DOCTOR TOOLE ARRIVES IN
THE MORNING WITH A MARVELLOUS
BUDGET OF NEWS.

THE good people who had established themselves in poor Nutter's domicile did not appear at all disconcerted by the priest's summons. His knock at the hall-door was attended to with the most consummate assurance by M. M.'s maid, just as if the premises had belonged to her mistress all her days.

Between this hussy and his reverence, who was in no mood to be trifled with, there occurred in the hall some very pretty sparring, which ended by his being ushered into the parlour, where sat Mistress Matchwell and dirty Davy, the "tea-things" on the table, and an odour more potent than that of the Chinese aroma circulating agreeably through the chamber.

I need not report the dialogue of the parties, showing how the honest priest maintained, under sore trial, his character for politeness while addressing a lady, and how he indemnified himself in the style in which he "discoarsed" the attorney; how his language fluctuated between the persuasively religious and the horribly profane; and how, at one crisis in the conversation, although he had self-command enough to bow to the matron, he was on the point of cracking the lawyer's crown with the fine specimen of Irish oak which he carried in his hand.

"But, supposin', ma'am," said his Reverence, referring to the astounding allegation of her marriage with Nutter; "for the sake of argumint, it should turn out to be so, in coorse you would not like to turn the poor woman out iv doors, without a penny in her pocket, to beg her bread?"

"Your friend up-stairs, sir, intended playing the lady for the hear their own ears," and the conclusion of the sentence was overwhelmed in "Many's the bottle I cracked in my time."

"The devil burn the lot o' them, my dear, an' a purty evenin' they choose for their vagaries—an' law papers, too, you say, an' an attorney into the bargain—there's no influence you can bring to bear on them fellows. If 'twas another man, an' a couple more at his back, myself an' Pat Moran 'id wallop them out of the house, an' into the river, be gannies! as aisy as say an ave."

But Father Roach, though sometimes a little bit testy, and, on the whole, not without faults, was as good-natured an anchorite as ever said mass or brewed a contemplative bowl of punch. If he refused to go down to the Mills, he would not have been comfortable again that night, nor indeed for a week to come. So, with a sigh, he made up his mind, got quietly into his surtout and mufflers, which hung on the peg behind the hall-door, clapped on his hat, grasped his stout oak stick, and telling his housekeeper to let them know, in case his guests should miss him, that he was obliged to go out for ten minutes or so on parish business, forth sallied the stout priest, with no great appetite for knight-errantry, but still anxious to rescue, if so it might be, the distressed princess, begirt with giants and enchanterers, at the Mills.

At the Salmon House he enlisted the stalworth Paddy Moran, with the information conveyed to that surprised reveler that he was to sleep at "Mrs. Nutter's house" that night; and so, at a brisk pace, the clerical knight, his squire, and demoiselle-errant, proceeded to the Mills.

---

CHAPTER LXXV.

IN WHICH, WHILE THE HARMONY CONTINUES IN FATHER ROACH'S
FRONT PARLOR, A FEW DISCORDS ARE INTRODUCED
ELSEWHERE; AND DOCTOR TOOLE ARRIVES IN
THE MORNING WITH A MARVELLOUS
BUDGET OF NEWS.

THE good people who had established themselves in poor Nutter's domicile did not appear at all disconcerted by the priest's summons. His knock at the hall-door was attended to with the most consummate assurance by M. M.'s maid, just as if the premises had belonged to her mistress all her days.

Between this hussy and his reverence, who was in no mood to be trifled with, there occurred in the hall some very pretty sparring, which ended by his being ushered into the parlour, where sat Mistress Matchwell and dirty Davy, the "tea-things" on the table, and an odour more potent than that of the Chinese aroma circulating agreeably through the chamber.

I need not report the dialogue of the parties, showing how the honest priest maintained, under sore trial, his character for politeness while addressing a lady, and how he indemnified himself in the style in which he "discoorsed" the attorney; how his language fluctuated between the persuasively religious and the horribly profane; and how, at one crisis in the conversation, although he had self-command enough to bow to the matron, he was on the point of cracking the lawyer's crown with the fine specimen of Irish oak which he carried in his hand.

"But, supposin', ma'am," said his Reverence, referring to the astounding allegation of her marriage with Nutter; "for the sake of argumint, it should turn out to be so, in coorse you would not like to turn the poor woman out iv doors, without a penny in her pocket, to beg her bread?"

"Your friend up-stairs, sir, intended playing the lady for the rest of her days," answered M. M., with a catlike demureness, sly and cruel, "at my cost, and to my sorrow, For twenty long years, or nigh hand it, she has lived with my husband, consuming my substance, and keeping me in penury. What did she allow me all that time?—not so much as that crust—ha! ha! I suppose she owes me for her maintenance here—in my house, out of my property—fully two thousand pounds. Make money of that, sir!—and my lawyer advises me to make her pay it."

"Or rather to make her account, ma'am; or you will, if she's disposed to act fairly, take anything you may be advised, to be reasonable and equitable, ma'am," interposed Dirty Davy.

"That's it," resumed Madam Mary. "I don't want her four bones. Let her make up one thousand pounds—that's reason, sir—and I'll forgive her the remainder. But if she won't, then to gaol I'll send her, and there she may rot for me."

"You persave, sir," continued the attorney; "your client—I mane your friend—has fixed herself in the character of an agent—all the late gintleman's money, you see, went through her hands—an agent or a steward to Charles Nutter, desased—an' a coort iv equity 'll hould her liable to account, ye see; an' we know well enough what money's past through her hands annually—an, whatever she can prove to have been honestly applied, we'll be quite willin' to allow; but, you see, we must have the balance!"

"Balance!" says the priest, incensed beyond endurance; "if you stay balancin' here, my joker, much longer, you'll run a raysonable risk of balancin' by the neck out iv one of them trees before the doore."

"So you're threatenin' my life, sir!" said the attorney, with a sly defiance.

"You lie like the devil, sir—savin' your presence, ma'am. Don't you know the differ, sir, between a threat an' a waroin', you bosthoon?" thundered his Reverence.

"You're sthriyin' to provoke me to a brache iv the pace, as the company can testify," said Dirty Davy.

"Ye lie again, you—you fat crature—'tis thryin' to provoke you to keep the pace I am. Listen to me, the both o' yez—the leedy up-stairs, the misthress iv this house, and widow of poor Charles Nutter—Mrs. Sally Nutther, I say—is well liked in the parish; an' if they get the wind o' the word, all I say 's this—so sure as you're found here holdin' wrongful possession of her house an' goods, the boys iv Palmerstown, Castleknock, and Chapelizod, will pay yez a visit you won't like, and duck yez in the river, or hang yez together, like a pair of common robbers, as you unquestionably are—not," he added, with a sudden sense of legal liability.

"Who's that?" demanded the lynx-eyed lady, who saw Pat Moran cross the door in the shadow of the lobby.

"That's Mr. Moran, a most respectable and muscular man, come here to keep possession, madam, for Mrs. Sally Nutther, our good friend and neighbour, ma'am," replied the priest.

"As you please, sir," replied the attorney; "your tumblin' yourself and your friend into a nice predicament—as good a construtive ousther, vi et armis, as my client could possibly desire. Av coorse, sir, we'll seek compensation in the regular way for this violent threspas; and we have you criminally, you'll obsarve, no less than civilly."

"Now, look—ondherstand me—don't affect to misteek, av you please," said the priest, not very clear or comfortable, for he had before had one or two brushes with the law, and the recollection was disagreeable: "I—Mr. Moran—we're here, sir—the both iv us, as you sec—pacibly—and—and—all to that and at the request of Mrs. Sally Nutther—an' I tell you what's more—if you make any row here—do you mind—I'll come down with the magisthrate an' the soldiers, an' lave it to them to dale with you accordin'—mind ye—to law an' equity, civil, human, criminal, an' divine—an' make money o' that, ye—ye mountain in labour—savin' your presence, ma'am."

"I thank you—that'll do, sir," said the lawyer, with a lazy chuckle.

"I'll now do myself the honour to make my compliments to Mrs. Sally Nutther," said Father Roach, making a solemn bow to Mrs. Matchwell, who, with a shrill sneer, pursued him as he disappeared with—

"The lady in the bed-room, your Reverence?"

Whereat Dirty Davy renewed his wheezy chuckle.

Nothing daunted, the indignant divine stumped resolutely upstairs, and found poor Sally Nutter, to whose room he was joyfully admitted by honest Betty, who knew his soft, honest brogue, in a panic, the violence of which had almost superseded her grief. So he consoled and fortified the poor lady as well as he could, and when she urged him to remain in the house all night,

"My dear ma'am," says he, lifting his hand and shaking his head, slowly, with closed eyes, "you forget my character. Why, the house is full iv faymales. My darlin' Mrs. Nutther, I—I couldn't enthertain sich-an idaya; and, besides," says he, with sudden energy, recollecting that the goose might be overdone, "there's a religious duty, my dear ma'am—the holy sacrament waitin'—a pair to be married; but Pat Moran will keep them quiet till mornin', and I'll be down myself to see you then. So my earvice to you, Mrs. Nutther, and God bless you, my dear ma'am."

And with this valediction the priest departed.

Dr. Toole arrived at ten o'clock next morning with news that shook the village. The inquest was postponed to the evening, to secure the attendance of some witnesses who could throw a light, it was thought, on the inquiry. Then Dr. Toole was examined, and identified the body at first confidently.

"But," said he, in the great parlour of the Phoenix where he held forth, "though the features were as like as two eggs, it struck me the forehead was a thought broader. So, said I, I can set the matter at rest in five minutes. Charles Nutter's left upper arm was broken midway, and I set it; there would be the usual deposit where the bone knit, and he had a sword-thrust through his right shoulder, cicatrized, and very well defined; and he had lost two under-teeth. Well, the teeth were gone, but three instead of two, and on laying the arm-bone bare, 'twas plain it had never been broken, and, in like manner, nothing wrong with the right shoulder, and there was nothing like so much deltoid and biceps as Nutter had. So says I, at once, be that body whose it may, 'tis none of Charles Nutter's, and to that I swear, gentlemen; and I had hardly made an end when 'twas identified for the corpse of the French hair-dresser, newly arrived from Paris, who was crossing the Liffey, on Tuesday night, you remember, at the old ferry-boat slip, and fell in and was drowned. So that part of the story's ended.

"But, gentlemen," continued Toole, with the important and resolute bearing of a man who has a startling announcement to make, "I am sorry to have to tell you that poor Charles Nutter's in gaol."

In gaol! was echoed in all sorts of tones from his auditory, with an abundance of profane ejaculations of wonderment, concern, and horror.

"Ay, gentlemen, in the body of the gaol."

Then it came out that Nutter had been arrested that very morning, in a sedan-chair, at the end of Cook-street, and was now in the county prison awaiting his trial; and that, no doubt, bail would be refused, which, indeed, turned out truly.

So, when all these amazing events had been thoroughly discussed, the little gathering dispersed to blaze them abroad, and Toole wrote to Mr. Gamble, to tell him that "the person, M. M., Mary Matchwell, claiming to be the wife of Charles Nutter, had established herself at the Mills, and is disposed to be troublesome, and terrifies poor Mrs. Sally Nutter, who is ill; it would be a charity to come out and direct measures. I know not what ought to be done, though confident her claim is a bag of moonshine and lies, and, if not stopped, she'll make away with the goods and the furniture, which is mighty hard upon this unfortunate lady," etc., etc.

"That Mary Matchwell, as I think, ought to be in gaol for the assault on Sturk; her card, you know, was found in the mud beside him, and she's fit for any devil's work."

This was addressed by Toole to his good wife.

"That card?" said Jimmey, who happened to be triturating a powder in the corner for little Master Barney Sturk, and who suspended operations, and spoke with the pestle in his fingers, and a very cunning leer on his sharp features; "I know all about that card."

"You do—do you? and why didn't you spake out long ago, you vagabond?" said Toole. "Well, then! come now!—what's in your knowledge-box?—out with it."

"Why, I had that card in my hand the night Mr. Nutter went off."

"Well?—go on."

"'Twas in the hall at the Mills, sir; I knew it again at the Barracks the minute I seen it."

"Why, 'tis a printed card—there's hundreds of them—how d'ye know one from t'other, wisehead?"

"Why, sir, 'twas how this one was walked on, and the letter M. in Mary was tore across, an' on the back was writ, in red ink, for Mrs. Macnamara, and they could not read it down at the Barracks, because the wet got at it, and the end was mostly washed away, and they thought it was MacNally, or MacIntire; but I knew it the minute I seen it."

"Well, my tight little fellow, and what the dickens has all that to do with the matter?" asked Toole, growing uneasy.

"The dickens a much, I believe sir; only as Mr. Nutter was goin' out he snatched it out o' my hand—in the hall there—and stuffed it into his pocket."

"You did not tell that cursed lying story, did you? about the town, you mischievous young spalpeen," demanded the Doctor, shaking his disciple rather roughly by the arm.

"No—I—I didn't—I did not tell, sir—what is it to me?" answered the boy, frightened.

"You didn't tell—not you, truly. I lay you a tenpenny-bit there isn't a tattler in the town but has the story by rote—a pretty kettle o' fish you'll make of it, with your meddling and lying. If 'twas true, 'twould be another matter, but—hold your tongue!—how the plague are you to know one card from another when they're all alike, and Mrs. Macnamara, Mrs. Macfiddle. Well, mind my words, you've got yourself into a pretty predicament; I'd walk twice from this to the county court-house and back again, only to look at it; a pleasant cross-hackling the counsellors will give you, and if you prevaricate—you know what that is, my boy—the judge will make short work with you, and you may cool your heels in gaol as long as he pleases, for me."

"And, look'ee," said Toole, returning, for he was going out, as he generally did, whenever he was profoundly ruffled; "you remember the affidavit-man that was whipped and pilloried this time two years for perjury, eh? Look to it, my fine fellow. There's more than me knows how Mr. Nutter threatened to cane you that night—and 'twouldn't take much to persuade an honest jury that you wanted to pay him off for that by putting a nail in his coffin, you young miscreant! Go on—do—and I promise you'll get an airing yet you'll not like—you will."

And so Toole strutted out into the village street, where he was seen, with a pursed mouth and a flushed visage, to make a vicious cut or two with his cane in the air as he walked along. And it must be allowed that Master Jimmey's reflections were rather confused and uncomfortable, as he pondered over the past and the future with the pestle in his fingers and the Doctor's awful words ringing in his ears.

---

CHAPTER LXXI.

SHOWING HOW LITTLE LILY'S LIFE BEGAN TO CHANGE INTO A RETROSPECT; AND HOW ON A SUDDEN SHE BEGAN TO FEEL BETTER.

As time wore on, little Lilius was not better. When she had read her Bible, and closed it, she would sit long silent, with a sad look, thinking; and often she would ask old Sally questions about her mother, and listen to her, looking all the time with a strange and earnest gaze through the glass-door upon the evergreens and the early snowdrops. And old Sally was troubled somehow, and saddened at her dwelling so much upon this theme.

And one evening, as they sat together in the drawing-room—she and the good old Rector—she asked him, too, gently, about her; for he never shrank from talking of the beloved dead, but used to speak of her often, with a simple tenderness, as if she were still living.

"Some conflicts my darling had the day before her departure," he said; "but such as through God's goodness lasted not long, and ended in the comfort that continued to her end, which was so quiet and so peaceable, we who were nearest about her, knew not the moment of her departure. And little Lily was then but an infant—a tiny little thing. Ah! if my darling had been spared to see her grown-up, such a beauty, and so like her!"

And so he rambled on; and when he looked at her, little Lily was weeping; and as he looked she said, trying to smile—

"Indeed, I don't know why I'm crying, darling. There's nothing the matter with your little Lily—only I can't help crying; and I'm your foolish little Lily, you know."

And this often happened, that he found she was weeping when he looked on her suddenly, and she used to try to smile, and both, then, to cry together, and neither say what they feared, only each unspeakably more tender and loving. Ah, yes! in their love was mingling now something of the yearning of a farewell, which neither would acknowledge.

One morning, old Sally, who, in her quiet way, used to tell all the little village news she heard, thinking to make her young mistress smile, or at least listen, said—

“And that wild young gentleman, Captain Devereux, is growing godly, they say; Mrs. Irons tells me how he calls for his Bible o’ nights, and how he does not play cards, nor eat suppers at the Phoenix, nor keep bad company, nor go into Dublin, but goes to church; and she says she does not know what to make of him.”

Little Lily did not speak or raise her head; she went on stirring the little locket that lay on the table, with the tip of her finger, looking on it silently. She did not seem to mind old Sally’s talk, almost to hear it, but when it ended, she waited, still silent, as a child, when the music is over, listens for more.

When she came down, she placed her chair near the window, that she might see the snowdrops and the crocuses.

“The spring at last, Sally, my darling, and I feel so much better;” and Lily smiled on the flowers through the window, and I fancy the flowers opened in that beautiful light.

And she said, every now and then, that she felt “so much better—so much stronger,” and made old Sally sit by her, and talk to her, and smiled so happily, and there again were all her droll engaging little ways. And when the good Rector came in, that evening, she welcomed him in the old pleasant way: though she could not run out, as in other times, when she heard his foot on the steps, to meet him at the door, and there was such a beautiful colour in her clear thin cheeks, and she sang his favorite little song for him, just one verse, with the clear, rich voice, he loved so well, and then tired. The voice remained in his ears long after, and often came again, and that little song, in lonely reveries, while he sat listening, in long silence, and twilight, a swan’s song.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

IN WHICH TWO ACQUAINTANCES BECOME, ON A SUDDEN, MARVELOUS FRIENDLY IN THE CHURCH-YARD ; AND MR. DANGERFIELD SMOKES A PIPE IN THE BRASS CASTLE, AND RESOLVES THAT THE DUMB SHALL SPEAK.

ON Sunday, Mervyn, after the good Doctor's sermon and benediction, wishing to make inquiry of the Rector touching the movements of his clerk, whose place was provisionally supplied by a corpulent and unctuous mercenary from Dublin, loitered in the church-yard to allow time for the congregation to disperse, and the parson to disrobe and emerge.

He was reading an epitaph on an expansive black flag-stone, in the far corner of the church-yard, upon several ancestral members of the family of Lowe ; and musing, as sad men will, upon the dates and vanities of the record, when a thin white hand was lightly laid upon his sleeve from behind ; and looking round, in expectation of seeing the Rector's grave, simple, kindly countenance, he beheld, instead, with a sort of odd thrill, the white glittering face of Mr. Paul Dangerfield.

"I was thinking, Mr. Mervyn," said Mr. Dangerfield, politely, "of walking up to the Tiled House, after church, to pay my respects, and ask the favour of five minutes' discourse with you ; and seeing you here I ventured to present myself."

"If I can do anything to serve Mr. Dangerfield," began Mervyn.

Dangerfield smiled and bowed.

"You mistake me, sir. I'm all gratitude ; but I don't mean to trouble you further than to ask your attention for two or three minutes. I've a thing to tell you, sir. I'm really anxious to serve you. And 'tis only that I've recollected since I saw you a circumstance of which possibly you may make some use."

"I'm deeply obliged, sir—deeply," said Mervyn eagerly.

"I'm only, sir, too happy. It relates to Charles Archer. I've recollected, since I saw you, a document concerning his death. It had a legal bearing of some sort, and was signed by, at least, three gentlemen. One was Sir Philip Drayton, of Drayton Hall, who was with him in Florence at his last illness. I may have signed it myself, but I don't recollect. It was by his express desire—to quiet, as I remember, some proceedings which might have made a noise and compromised his family."

"Can you bring to mind the nature of the document?"

"Why, thus much. I'm quite sure it began with a certificate of his death; and then, I think, was added a statement, at his last request, which surprised, or perhaps, shocked us. I only say I think—for though I remember that such a statement was solemnly made, I can't bring to mind whether it was set out in the writing of which I speak. Only I am confident it referred to some crime—a confession of something; but for the life of me I can't recollect what. If you could let me know the subject of your suspicion it might help me. I should never have remembered this occurrence, for instance, had it not been for our meeting to-day. I can't exactly—in fact, at all—bring to mind what the crime was; forgery or perjury—eh?"

"Why, sir, 'twas this," said Mervyn, and stopped short, not knowing how far even this innocent confidence might compromise Irons. Dangerfield, his head slightly inclined, was disconcertingly silent and attentive.

"I—I suspect," resumed Mervyn. "I suspect, sir, 'twas perjury," said Mervyn.

"Oh! perjury? I see—in the matter of his testimony in that distressing prosecution. My Lord Dunoran—hey?"

Mervyn bowed, and Dangerfield remained silently thoughtful for a minute or two, and then said:—

"I see, sir—I think I see; but, who then was the guilty man, who killed Mr.—pooh, What's-his name—the deceased man—you know?"

"Why upon that point, sir, I should have some hesitation in speaking. I can only now say thus much, that I'm satisfied he, Charles Archer, in swearing as he did, committed wilful perjury."

"You are!—oho!—ho! This is satisfactory. You don't, of course, mean mere conjecture—eh?"

"I know not, sir, how you would call it, but 'tis certainly a feeling fixed in my mind."

"Well, sir, I trust it may prove well founded. I wish I had myself a copy of that paper; but, though I have it not, I think I can put you in a way to get it. It was addressed, I perfectly recollect, to the Messrs. Elrington, gentlemen attorneys, in Chancery-lane, London. I remember it, because my Lord Castlemallard employed them eight or nine years afterwards in some law business, which recalled the whole matter to my mind before it had quite faded. No doubt, they have it there. 'Twas about a week after his death. The date of that you can have from newspapers. You'll not mention my name when writing, because they mayn't like the trouble of searching, and my Lord Castlemallard would not approve my meddling in other persons' affairs—even in yours."

"Sir," said Mervyn, suddenly, "I cannot thank you half enough. This statement, should it appear attached, as you suppose, to the certificate, may possibly place me on the track of that lost witness, who yet may restore my ruined name and fortunes. I thank you, sir. From my heart I thank you."

And he grasped Dangerfield's white thin hand in his, with a fervor how unlike his cold greeting of only a few minutes before, and shook it with an eager cordiality.

So, side by side they returned, picking their steps among the graves and headstones, to the old church porch.

For a day or two after the storm, the temper of our cynical friend of the silver spectacles had suffered. Perhaps he did not like the news which had reached him since, and would have preferred that Charles Nutter had made good his escape from the gripe of justice.

Perhaps a little occurrence, which Mr. Dangerfield himself utterly despised, may have had something to do with this bitter temper, and gave an unsatisfactory turn to his thoughts. It took place on the eventful night of the tempest.

If some people saw visions that night, others dreamed dreams. In a midnight storm like this, time was when the solemn peal and defiant clang of the holy bells would have rung out confusion through the winged hosts of "the prince of the powers of the air," from the heights of the abbey tower. Whatever the cause, upon such nights of storm, the sensoria of some men are crossed by such wild variety and succession of images, as amounts very nearly to the waltz of a fever. Upon the night in question, Mr. Paul Dangerfield, who was not troubled either with vapours or superstitions, as he lay in his green-curtained bed in the Brass Castle, had as many dreams flitting over his brain and voices humming and buzzing in his ears, as if he had been a poet or a pythoness.

He had not become a dreamer of dreams habitually. I suppose he did dream. The beasts do. But his visions never troubled him; and I don't think there was one morning in a year on which he could have remembered his last night's dream at the breakfast-table.

On this particular night, however, he did dream. Vidit somnium. He thought that Sturk was dead, and laid out in a sort of state in an open coffin, with a great bouquet on his breast, something in the continental fashion, as he remembered it in the case of a great, stern, burly ecclesiastic in Florence. The coffin stood on tressels in the aisle of Chapelizod church; and, of all persons in the world, he and Charles Nutter stood side by side as chief mourners.

Now, in dreams it sometimes happens that men undergo sensations of awe, and even horror, such as waking they never know, and which the scenery and situation of the dream itself appear wholly inadequate to produce. Mr. Paul Dangerfield, had he been called on to do it, would have kept solitary watch in a dead man's chamber, and smoked his pipe as serenely as he would in the club-room of the Phoenix. But here it was different. The company were all hooded and silent, sitting in rows; and there was a dismal sound of distant waters, and an indefinable darkness and horror in the air, and, on a sudden, up sat the corpse of Sturk, and thundered, with a shriek, a dreadful denunciation, and Dangerfield started up in his bed aghast, and cried—"Charles Archer!"

The storm was bellowing and shrieking outside, and for some time that grim, white gentleman, bolt upright in his shirt, did not know distinctly in what part of the world, or, indeed, in what world he was.

"So," said Mr. Dangerfield, soliloquizing, "Charles Nutter's alive, and in prison, and - what comes next? 'Tis enough to make one believe in a devil almost! Why wasn't he drowned, d——n him? How did he get himself taken, d——n him again? From the time I came into this unlucky village I've smelt danger. That accursed beast a corpse, and a ghost, and a prisoner at last—well, he has been my evil genius. If he were drowned or hanged; born to be hanged, I hope: all I want is quiet—just quiet; but I've a feeling the play's not played out yet. He'll give the hangman the slip, will he; not if I can help it, though; but caution, sir, caution; life's at stake—my life's on the cast."

Now this soliloquy, which broke into an actual mutter every here and there, occurred at about eleven o'clock, A. M., in the little low parlour of the Brass Castle, that looked out on the wintry river.

Mr. Dangerfield knew the virtues of tobacco, so he charged his pipe, and sat grim, white, and erect, by the fire. It is not every one that is "happy thinking," and the knight of the silver spectacles followed out his solitary discourse, with his pipe between his lips, and saw all sorts of things through the white narcotic smoke.

"It would not do to go off and leave affairs thus; a message might follow me, eh? No; I'll stay and see it out, quite out. Sturk—Barnabas Sturk. If he came to his speech for five minutes—hum—we'll see. I'll speak with Mrs. Sturk about it—we must help him to his speech—a prating fellow; 'tis in the interest of justice—eternal justice—ha, ha, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Let Dr. Sturk be sworn—ha, ha—there is nothing hidden that shall not be revealed; ha, ha. Let Dr. Sturk be called."

So the white, thin phantom of the spectacles and tobacco pipe, sitting upright by the fire, amused himself with a solitary banter. Then he knocked the white ashes out upon the hob, stood up with his back to the fire, in grim rumination, for about a minute, at the end of which he unlocked his desk, and took forth a letter, with a large red seal. It was more than two months old by this time, and was in fact that letter from the London doctor which he had expected with some impatience.

It was not very long, and standing he read it through, and his white face contracted, and darkened, and grew strangely intense and stern as he did so.

"'Tis devilish strong—ha, ha, ha—conclusive, indeed." He was amused again. "I've kept it long enough—igni reservata."

And holding it in the tongs, he lighted a corner, and as the last black fragment of it, covered with creeping sparks, flew up the chimney, he heard the voice of a gentleman hallooing in the court-yard.

---

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

IN WHICH MR. DANGERFIELD RECEIVES A VISITER AND MAKES A CALL.

DANGERFIELD walked out and blandly greeted the visitor, who turned out to be Mr. Justice Lowe.

"I give you good morning, sir; pray, alight and step in. Hallo, Doolan, take Mr. Justice Lowe's horse."

So Mr. Lowe thanked him, in his cold way, and bowing, strode into the Brass Castle; and after the customary civilities, he sat himself down, and says he,

"I've been at the Crown Office, sir, about this murder we may call it, upon Sturk, and I told them you could throw a light, as I thought, on the matter."

"As how, sir!"

"Why, regarding the kind-of feeling that subsisted between the prisoner, Nutter, and Doctor Sturk."

"Well, I suppose it was that; there certainly was an unpleasant feeling—very unpleasant."

"You've heard him express it?"

"Yes; I think most gentlemen who know him have. Why, he made no disguise of it; he was no great talker, but we've heard him on that subject."

"But you specially know how it stood between them in respect of the agency?"

"Yes."

"Very good, sir," said Lowe.

"And I've a notion that something decisive should be done toward effecting a full discovery, and I'll consider of a method," replied Dangerfield.

"How do you mean?" said Lowe, looking up with a glance like a hawk.

"How! why I'll talk it over with Mrs. Sturk this evening."

"Why, what has she got to tell?"

"Nothing, as I suppose; I'll see her to-day; there's nothing to tell; but something, I think, to be done; it hasn't been set about rightly; 'tis a botched business hitherto—that's in my judgment."

"Yet 'tis rather a strong case," answered Mr. Lowe, superciliously.

"Rather a strong case, so it is, but I'll clench it, sir; it ought to be certain."

"Well, sir?" said Lowe, who expected to hear more.

"Yes," said Dangerfield, briskly, "'twill depend on her; I'll suggest, she'll decide."

"And why she, sir?" said Lowe, sharply.

"Because 'tis her business and her right, and no one else can," answered Dangerfield just as tartly, with his hands in his breeches' pockets, and his head the least thing o' one side, and then with a bow, "won't you drink a glass of wine, sir?" which was as much as to say, you'll get no more from me.

"I thank you, sir, no; 'tis a little too early for me." And so with the usual ceremonies, Mr. Lowe departed, and as he rode away towards Lucan, Mr. Dangerfield followed him with a snowy grin.

Then briskly, after his wont, the knight of the shining spectacles made his natty toilet; and in a few minutes his cocked-hat was seen gliding along the hedge toward Chapelizod.

He glanced up at Sturk's windows, it was a habit now, so soon as he came in sight, but all looked as usual. So he mounted the steps, and asked to see Mrs. Sturk.

"My dear Madam," said he, after due courtesies interchanged, "I've but a few minutes; my horse waits yonder at the Phoenix, and I'm away to town. How does your patient to-day?"

"Oh, mighty well—wonderful—that is considering how cold the weather is."

"Perhaps, ma'am, you'd let me see him?"

"See him?"

"Yes; look on him, ma'am, only for a moment, you know."

She looked very much surprised, and perhaps a little curious and frightened.

"I hope you haven't heard he's worse, Mr. Dangerfield. Oh, sir, sure you haven't!"

"No, madam, on my honour, except from yourself I've heard nothing of him to-day; but I'd like to see him, and speak a word to you, with your permission."

So Mrs. Sturk led the way up-stairs.

"You may go down, my dear," said Mr. Dangerfield to the little girl, who rose silently from the chair as they entered; "with your permission, Mistress Sturk—I say, child, you may run down," with a little wave of his finger toward the door. So she courtesied and vanished obediently.

Then he drew the curtain, and looked on Dr. Sturk. There lay the hero of the tragedy, his smashed head strapped together with sticking-plaster, and a great white fold of fine linen, like a fantastic turban, surmounting his grim yellow features.

Then he slipped his fingers under the coverlet and took his hand; a strange greeting that! But it was his pulse he wanted, and when he had felt it for a while—

"Psha!" said he in a low tone—"his pulse is just gone. Now, madam, listen to me. There's not a soul in Chapelized but yourself who does not know his wounds are mortal—he's dying, ma'am."

"Oh—oh—o—o—oh, Mr. Dangerfield, you don't—you don't think so," wildly cried the poor little lady, growing quite white with terror and agony.

"Now, madam, I protest you'll make me regret my visit, unless you please to command yourself. While the doctors who are about him have got him in hands, there's neither hope for his life, nor for his recovering, for one moment, the use of his speech. They state as much themselves. Now, madam, I say we must have a chance for his life, and if that fails, a chance for his speech. The latter, madam, is of more consequence than, perhaps, you are aware."

Poor little Mrs. Sturk was looking very pale, and breathing very hard, with her hand pressed to her heart.

"I've done what I could, you know, to see my way through his affairs, and I've succeeded in keeping his creditors quiet."

At this point, poor Mrs. Sturk broke out—

"Oh! may the Father of the fatherless, if such they are to be, bless and reward—oh—oh, ho—ho, Mr. Dangerfield—oh—oh—oh—sir."

"Now, pray madam, oblige me and be tranquil. I say, madam, his affairs, I suspect, are by no means in so bad a case as we at first supposed, and he has got, or I am mistaken, large sums out, but where, neither I nor you can tell. Give him five minutes' speech, and it may be worth a thousand pounds to you—well, not to you, if you will, but to his children. And again, madam, 'tis of the utmost importance that he should be able to state who was the villain who struck him—Charles—a—Charles—Mr. Nutter—you know, madam."

"Oh! that dreadful—dreadful man—may heaven forgive him. Oh, my Barney! look at him there—he'd forgive him if he could speak. You would; my blessed Barney—you would."

"To be sure he would. But see, ma'am, the importance of having his evidence to settle the fact. Suppose, ma'am, Charles Nutter is innocent, don't you think he'd like to acquit him; ay, you do. Well, ma'am, 'tis due to the public, you see, and to his children that he should have a chance of recovering his speech, and to common humanity that he should have a chance for his life, eh? and neither will the doctors who have him in hands allow him. Now, madam, there's a simple operation, called trepanning, which would afford him such a chance, but fearing its failure they won't try it, although they allege that without it he must die, d'ye see?—ay, die he must, without a cast for his life if you won't try it."

And so, by harping on the alternatives, and demonstrating the prudence, humanity, and duty of action, and the inevitably fatal consequences of the other course, he wrought upon her at last to write a note to Surgeon Dillon to come out on the evening, and to perform the operation. The dreadful word "to-day," the poor little woman could not abide. She pleaded for a respite, and so, half distracted, fixed to-morrow.

"I hope, my dear madam, you have some little confidence in me. I think I have shown an interest, and I've striven to be of use."

"Oh, sir, Mr. Dangerfield, you've been too good, our guardian angel; but for you, sir, we should not have had a roof over our heads, or a bed to lie on; oh! may"——

"Well, ma'am, you please to speak too highly of my small services; but I would plead them, humble as they are, as a claim on your confidence, and having decided upon this wise and necessary course, pray do not say a word about it to anybody but myself. I will go to town and arrange for the Doctor's visit, and you'll soon, I hope, have real grounds for gratitude, not to me, ma'am, but to Heaven."

m

---

CHAPTER LXXIX.

IN WHICH MR. PAUL DANGERFIELD PAYS HIS RESPECTS AND COMPLIMENTS AT BELMONT: WHERE OTHER VISITERS, ALSO, PRESENT THEMSELVES.

BEFORE going to town, Mr. Dangerfield, riding over the bridge and up the Palmerstown-road, dismounted at Belmont door-steps and asked for the General. He was out. Then for Miss Rebecca Chatterworth. Yes, she was in the withdrawing-room. And so light, white, and wiry, he ascended the stairs swiftly.

"Mr. Dangerfield," cried Dominick, throwing open the door ; and that elderly and ill-starred wooer glided in thereat.

"Madam, your most humble servant."

"Oh! Mr. Dangerfield! You're very welcome, sir," said Aunt Becky, with a grand courtesy, and extending her thin jewelled hand, which he took gallantly, with another bow, and a smile, and a flash from his spectacles.

Aunt Becky laid down her volume of Richardson. And Mr. Dangerfield said—

"I'm happy in having found you, madam ; for whatever be my disappointments elsewhere, to Miss Rebecca Chatterworth at least I owe a debt of gratitude, which, despairing to repay it, I can only acknowledge ; and leaving unacknowledged, I should have departed from Ireland most happily."

"You rate my poor wishes too highly, Mr. Dangerfield. I over-estimated, myself, my influence with the young lady ; but why speak of your departure, sir, so soon ? A little time may yet work a change."

"Madam," said he, with a shake of his head, "'tis hoping against hope. Time will add to my wrinkles without softening her aversion. I utterly despair. While there remained one spark of hope I should never have dreamed of leaving Chapelized."

"Of course, sir, if the chance be not worth waiting for, you do well to be gone wherever your business or your pleasures, sir, invite you," said Aunt Becky, a little loftily.

"Neither business, madam, nor pleasures invite me. My situation here has been most distressing. So long as hope cheered me, I little regarded what might be said or thought ; but I tell you honestly that hope is extinguished ; and it has grown to me intolerable longer to remain in sight of that treasure for which I cannot cease to wish, and which I never can possess. I've grown, madam, to detest the place. So, madam," said he, standing up abruptly, "I am here to thank you most gratefully for the countenance given to my poor suit, which, here and now, at last and for ever, I forego. I shall leave for England as soon as my business will allow; and as I made no secret of my suit, so I shall make none of the reasons of my departure. I'm an outspoken man, madam; and as the world knew my hopes, I shall offer them no false excuses for departure; but lift my hat, and bow to fortune—a defeated man.”

“Well, sir, I will not altogether deny you have reason for what you design; and, it may be, 'tis as well to bring the matter to a close, though your resolution has taken me by surprise. She hath shown herself so perverse in this respect, that I allow I see no present likelihood of a change; and indeed I do not quite understand my niece; and, very like, she does not comprehend herself.”

Mr. Dangerfield almost smiled one of his grim disconcerting smiles, and a cynical light played over his face. The disappointed gentleman thought he understood Miss Gertrude pretty well.

“I thought,” said Aunt Becky; “I suspected—did you—a certain young gentleman in this neighborhood”—

“As having found his way to the young lady's good graces!” asked Dangerfield.

“Yes; and I conjecture you know whom I mean,” said Aunt Rebecca.

“Who—pray, madam?” he demanded.

“Why, Lieutenant Puddock,” said Aunt Becky, again adjusting the china, on the chimney-piece.

“Eh?—truly?—that did not strike me,” replied Dangerfield.

He had a disconcerting way of saying the most ordinary things, and there was a sort of latent meaning underrunning the surface of his talk, which sometimes made people undefinably uncomfortable; and Aunt Becky looked a little stately and flushed; but in a minute more the conversation proceeded.

“I have many regrets, Miss Chatterworth, in leaving this place. The loss of your society—don't mistake me, I never flatter—is a chief one. Some of your views and plans interested me much. I shall see my Lord Castlemallard sooner than I should had my wishes prospered; and I will do all in my power to engage him to give the site for the building, and stones from the quarry free; and I hope, though no longer a resident here, you will permit me to contribute fifty pounds towards the undertaking.”

“Sir, I wish there were more gentlemen of your public spirit and Christian benevolence,” cried Aunt Becky, very cordially; “and I have heard of all your goodness to that unhappy family of Doctor Sturk’s—poor wretched man!”

“A bagatelle, madam,” said Dangerfield, shaking his head and waving his hand slightly; “but I hope to do them, or at least the public, a service of some importance, by bringing conviction home to the assassin who struck him down, and that in terms so clear and authentic, as will leave no room for doubt in the minds of any one; and to this end I’m resolved to stick at no trifling sacrifice, and, rather than fail, I’ll drain my purse.”

“And, madam,” says he, after he had risen to take his leave, “as I before said, I’m a plain man. I mean, so soon as I can wind my business up, to leave this place and country—I would to-night, if I could; but less, I fear, than some days—perhaps a week—will not suffice. When I’m gone, madam, I beg you’ll exercise no reserve respecting the cause of my somewhat abrupt departure. I could easily make a pretext of something else; but the truth, madam, is easiest as well as best to be told, I protracted my stay so long as hope continued. Now my suit is ended. I can no longer endure the place. The remembrance of your kindness only sweetens the bitterness of my regret, and that I shall bear with me so long, madam, as life remains.”

And saying this, as Mr. Richardson writes, “he bowed upon her passive hand,” and Miss Rebecca made him a grand and gracious courtesy.

As he retreated, whom should Dominick announce but “Captain Cluffe and Lieutenant Puddock.” And there was an odd smile on Mr. Dangerfield's visage, as he slightly acknowledged them in passing, which Aunt Rebecca somehow did not like.

Cluffe, in virtue of his rank and pretensions, marched in the van, and, as Aunt Becky received him, little Puddock's round eyes swept the room, in search, perhaps, of some absent object.

"The General's not here," said Aunt Becky, loftily and severely, interpreting Puddock's wandering glance in that way. "Your visit, perhaps, is for him—you'll find him in his study, with the orderly."

"My visit, madam," said Puddock, with a slight blush, "was intended for you, madam—not for the General, whom I had the honour of seeing this morning on parade."

"Oh! for me? I thank you," said Aunt Rebecca, with a rather dry acknowledgment. And so she turned and chatted with Cluffe. While the conversation was going on, there came a horrid screech and a long succession of yelps from the court-yard.

"Good gracious mercy!" cried Aunt Rebecca, sailing rapidly to the window, "'tis Flora's voice. Sweet creature, have they killed you—my angel; what is it?—where are you, sweetheart?—where can she be? Oh, dear—oh, dear!" and she looked this way and that in her distraction.

But the squeak subsided, and Flora was not to be seen; and Aunt Becky's presence of mind returned, and she said—

"Captain Cluffe, 'tis a great liberty; but you're humane—and, besides, I know that you would really do me a kindness." That emphasis was shot at poor Puddock. "And may I pray you to try on the steps if you can see the dear animal anywhere—you know Flora?"

"Know her?—oh dear, yea," cried Cluffe, with alacrity, who, however, did not, but relied on her answering to her name, which he bawled lustily from the door-steps and about the court-yard, with many terms of endearment, intended for Aunt Becky's ear in the drawing-room.

Aunt Becky looked steadfastly from the window for a while, and then sailed majestically towards the door, which the little Ensign, with an humbled and somewhat frightened countenance, hastened to open.

"Pray, sir, don't let me trouble you," said Aunt Becky, in her high, cold way.

"Madam, 'tis no trouble—it would be a happiness to me, madam, to serve you in any way you would permit; but 'tis a trouble to me, madam, indeed, that you leave the room, and a greater trouble," said little Puddock, waxing fluent as he proceeded, "that I have incurred your displeasure—indeed, madam, I know not how—your goodness to me, madam, in my sickness, I never can forget."

"You can forget, sir—you have forgot. Though, indeed, sir, there was little to remember, I—I'm glad you thought me kind, sir. I—I wish you well, sir," said Aunt Becky. She was looking down and a little pale, and in her accents something hurried and almost sad. "And as for my displeasure, sir, who said I was displeased? And if I were, what could my displeasure be to you? No, sir," she went on almost fiercely, and with a little stamp on the floor, "you don't care; and why should you?—you've proved it—you don't, Lieutenant Puddock, and you never did."

And, without waiting for an answer, Aunt Becky flashed out of the room, and up-stairs to her chamber, the door of which she slammed fiercely.

When Cluffe, who for some time continued to exercise his lungs in persuasive invitations to Flora, at last gave over the pursuit, and returned to the drawing-room, to suggest that the goddess in question had probably retreated to the kitchen, he was a good deal chagrined to find the drawing-room "untreasured of its mistress."

Puddock looked a good deal put out, and his explanation was none of the clearest; and he could not at all say that the lady was coming back.

"I think, Lieutenant Puddock," said Cluffe, who was much displeased, and had come to regard Aunt Rebecca very much as under his special protection, "it might have been better we hadn't called here. I—you see—you're not—you see it yourself—you've offended Miss Rebecca Chatterworth somehow, and I'm afraid you've not mended matters while I was down stairs bawling after that cursed—that—the—little dog, you know. And—and for my part, I'm devilish sorry I came, sir."

This was said after a wait of nearly ten minutes, which appeared at least twice as long.

"I'm sorry, sir, I embarrassed you with the disadvantage of my company," answered little Puddock, with dignity.

"Why, 'tisn't that, you know," rejoined Cluffe, in a patronizing "my-good-fellow" sort of way; "you know I always liked your company devilish well. But where's the good of putting one's self in the way of being thought de trop—don't you see—by other people—and annoyed in this way—and—you—you don't know the world, Puddock—you'd much better leave yourself in my hands, d'ye see; and so, I suppose, we may as well be off now—'tis no use waiting longer."

And discontentedly and lingeringly the gallant Captain, followed by Puddock, withdrew himself—pausing to caress the wolf-dog at the corner of the court-yard, and loitering as long as was decent in the avenue.

---

CHAPTER LXXX.

IN WHICH THE KNIGHT OF THE SILVER SPECTACLES MAKES THE ACQUAINTANCE OF THE SAGE "BLACK DILLON," AND CONFERS WITH HIM IN HIS RETREAT.

At that time there had appeared in Dublin an erratic genius in the medical craft, a young surgeon, "Black Dillon," they called him, the glory and disgrace of his calling; such as are from time to time raised up to abuse the pride of intellect, and terrify the dabblers in vice. Without order, without industry; defying all usages and morality; lost for weeks together in the catacombs of vice; and emerging to re-assert in an hour the supremacy of his intellect; without principles or shame; laden with debt; and shattered and poisoned with his vices; a branded and admired man.

In the presence of this outcast genius and prodigy of vice, stood Mr. Dangerfield. There were two other gentlemen in the same small room, one of whom was doggedly smoking, with his hat on, over the fire; the other snoring in a crazy arm-chair, on the back of which hung his wig. The window was small and dirty; the air muddy with tobacco-smoke, and inflamed with whiskey. Singing and the clang of glasses was resounding from the next room, together with peals of coarse laughter, and from that on the other side, the high tones and hard swearing, and the emphatic slapping of a heavy hand upon the table, indicating a rising quarrel, was heard. From one door through another, across the narrow floor on which Mr. Dangerfield stood, every now and then lounged, some neglected, dirty, dissipated looking inmate of these unwholesome precincts. In fact, Surgeon Dillon's present residence was in that diversorium peccatorum, the Four Courts Marshalsea in Molesworth-court. As these gentlemen shuffled or swaggered through, they nodded, winked, grunted, or otherwise saluted the medical gentleman, and stared at his visitor.

Mr. Dangerfield stood erect; all his appointments were natty, and his dress, though quiet, rich in material, and there was that air of reserve, and decision, and command about him, which suggests money, an article held much in esteem in that retreat. He had a way of seeing every thing in a moment without staring or stealing glances, and nobody suspected him of making a scrutiny. In the young surgeon he saw an object in strong contrast with himself. He was lean and ungainly, shy and savage, dressed in a long greasy silk morning gown, blotched with wine and punch over the breast. He wore his own black hair gathered into a knot behind, and in a neglected dusty state, as if it had not been disturbed since he rolled out of his bed. This being placed, his large, red, unclean hands, with fingers spread, like a gentleman playing the harpsichord, upon the table, as he stood at the side opposite to Mr. Dangerfield, and he looked with a haggard, surly stare on his visitor, through his great dark, deep-set prominent eyes, streaming fire, the one feature that transfixed the attention of all who saw him.

"Tuppence, Docthor Dillon," said a short, fat, dirty nymph, without stays or hoop, setting down a "naggin o' whiskey" between the medical man and his visitor.

"Three halfpence outside, and twopence here, sir," said he with an awkward grin, throwing the money on the table; "that's the way our shepherd deglubat oves, sir; she's brought it too soon, but no matter."

It was not one o'clock, in fact.

"They will make mistakes, sir; but you will not suffer their blunders long, I warrant," said Dangerfield, lightly: "Pray, sir, can we have a room for the moment to ourselves?"

"We can, sir, 'tis a liberal house; we can have any thing; liberty itself, sir, for an adequate sum," replied Mr. Dillon.

Whatever the sum was, the room was had, and the surgeon, who had palpably left his "naggin" uneasily in company with the gentleman in the hat and him without a wig, eyed Dangerfield curiously.

"There's a great deal of diversion, sir, in five hundred guineas," said Mr. Dangerfield, and the spectacles flashed pleasantly upon the Doctor.

"Ye may say that," answered the grinning surgeon, with a quiet oath of expectation.

"'Tis a handsome fee, sir, and you may have it."

"Five hundred guineas!"

"Ay you've heard, sir, perhaps, of the attempted murder in the Park, on Doctor Sturk, of the Artillery; for which Mr. Nutter now lies in prison?" said Mr. Dangerfield.

"That I have, sir."

"Well, you shall have the money, sir, if you perform a simple operation."

"'Tis not to hang him you want me?" said the Doctor, with a gloomy sneer.

"Hang him!—ha, ha—no, sir, Doctor Sturk still lives, but insensible. He must be brought to consciousness, and speech. Now, the trepan is the only way to effect it; and I'll be frank with you: Doctor Pell has been with him half-a-dozen times, and he says the operation would be instantaneously fatal. I don't believe him. So also says Sir Hugh Skelton, to whom I wrote in London—I don't believe him, either. At all events, the man is dying, and can't last very many days longer, so there's nothing risked. His wife wishes the operation; here's her note; and I'll give you five hundred guineas and—what are you here for?"

"Only eighteen, unless some more has come in this morning," answered the Doctor.

"And your liberty, sir, that on the spot, if you undertake the operation, and the fee so soon as you have done it."

"Can you describe the case, sir, as you stated it to Sir Hugh Skelton?"

"Surely, sir, but I rely for it and the terms, upon the description of a village Doctor, named Toole; an ignoramus, I fear."

And with this preface he concisely repeated the technical description which he had compiled from various club conversations of Dr. Toole's, to which no person imagined he had been listening so closely.

"If that's the case, sir, 'twill kill him."

"Kill or cure, sir, 'tis the only chance," rejoined Dangerfield.

"What sort is the wife, sir?" asked Black Dillon, with a very odd look, while his eye still rested on the short note that poor Mrs. Sturk had penned.

"A nervous little woman of some two or three and forty," answered the spectacles.

The queer look subsided. He put the note in his pocket, looked puzzled, and then he asked—

"Is he any way related to you, sir?"

"None in life, sir. But that does not affect, I take it, the medical question."

"You want to have him speak? Well, suppose there's a hundred chances to one the trepan kills him on the spot—what then?" demanded the surgeon, uncomfortably.

Dangerfield pondered also uncomfortably for a minute, but answered nothing; on the contrary, he demanded—

"And what then, sir?"

"But here, in this case," said Black Dillon, "there's no chance at all, do you see, there's no chance, good, bad, or indifferent; none at all."

"See, sir," said Dangerfield, darkening, and speaking with a strange snarl; "I know what I'm about. I've a desire, sir, that he should speak, if 'twere only two minutes of conscious articulate life, and then death—'tis not a pin's point to me how soon. Left to himself he must die; therefore, to shrink from the operation on which depends the discovery both of his actual murderer and of his money, sir, otherwise lost to his family, is—is a damned affectation! I think it—so do you, sir; and I offer five hundred guineas as your fee, and Mrs. Sturk's letter to bear you harmless."

The surgeon looked very queer and gloomy down upon the table, and scratched his head, and he mumbled gruffly—

"You see—you know—'tis a large fee, to be sure; but then—"

"Come, sir," said Dangerfield, looking as though he'd pull him by the ear; "you should not stick at trifles, when there's—a—a—justice and humanity—and, to be brief, sir—yes or no?"

"Yes," answered the Doctor; "but how's the fee secured?"

"Hey! I'd forgot. Right, sir—you shall be satisfied."

"And he took a pen, and wrote on the back of a letter—

"SIR.—Considering the hopeless condition in which Dr. Sturk now lies, and the vast importance of restoring him, Dr. Sturk, of the R.I.A., to the power of speech, even for a few minutes, I beg to second Mrs. Stark's request to you; and when you shall have performed the critical operation she desires, I hereby promise, whether it succeed or fail, to give you a fee of five hundred guineas.

"PAUL DANGERFIELD.

"The Brass Castle, Chapelizod."

And he dated it, and handed it to the surgeon, who read it through, and then looked with a gruff hesitation at the writer. "Oh, you're only to inquire—any one who knows Chapelizod will tell you who I am; and you'll want something—eh?—to take you out of this—how much?"

"Only seven guineas. There's a little score here, and some fees. Eighteen will cover everything, unless something has come in this morning."

So they went to "the Hatch," and made inquiries, and all being well, Mr. Dangerfield dealt liberally with the surgeon, who promised to be in attendance at Dr. Sturk's house in Chapelizod, at seven o'clock next evening.

"And pray, Dr. Dillon, come in a coach," said Dangerfield, "and in costume—you understand. They've been accustomed, you know, to see Pell and other Doctors who make a parade." And with these injunctions, they parted.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

IN WHICH LILY'S TROUBLES END, DAN LOFTUS COMES HOME.

THIS evening Lily Walsingham was early tired and very weak, Sally thought, and more glad than usual to lie down in her bed; and there her old and loving nurse fancied that she looked a little strange, and that her thoughts sometimes wandered.

She lay very quietly for a good while, and suddenly, with a beautiful look, and in a clear, glad voice, she said—

“Mother!”

And old Sally said—

“There's no one, dear Miss Lily, but me.”

But she was looking earnestly, and, with a wrapt smile, only said—

“Oh!”

She thought she saw her, I believe.

Are these always illusions? Or is it only that, as the twilight deepens, and the shapes of earth melt into night, the stars of heaven, changeless and serene, reveal themselves, and shine out to the darkened eyes of mortals.

As Aunt Becky sat that night in the drawing-room with her niece, a maid, with a whisper, placed a little note in Miss Gertrude's hand. There was a little pause.

“Oh! aunt—oh!” and she looked so terrified. “Oh! aunt,” and she threw her arms round her aunt's neck, and began crying wildly, “Poor Lily's gone—there's the note.”

Then arose the wild wailing of unavailing grief, and sobs, mixed with early recollections of childhood, and all poor Lily's sweet traits poured out.

Old Aunt Rebecca took the note. Her stoicism was the point on which she piqued herself most. She looked very pale, and she told her niece to be composed; for Aunt Becky had a theory that feelings ought to be commanded, and that it only needed effort and resolution. So she read the note, holding her head very high, but the muscles of her face were quivering.

"Oh! Gertrude, if ever there was an angel—and the poor desolate old man——"

The theory broke down, and old Aunt Rebecca cried and sat down, and cried heartily, and went and put her thin arms round her niece, and kissed her, and cried, and cried, and kissed her again.

"She was such—such a darling—oh! Gertrude dear, we must never quarrel any more."

Death had come so near, and all things less than itself were rebuked in that sublime presence; and Lily Walsingham was gone; and she who was so lately their gay companion, all at once so awfully angelic in the unearthly light of death.

"Who'd a' thought it was so near, ma'am," said the maid; "the poor little thing! and every one has their hour, old and young, ma'am; and as I was sayin' they had no notion or expectation up at the Elms, ma'am, she was so bad, the heavens be her bed this night. 'Twas all in an instant likê, Miss, she made as if she'd sit up, bein' leanin' on pillows—and so she put out them purty little hands of hers, with a smile, and that was all—the purty crature—every one's sorry afther her. The man was cryin' in the hall that brought the note."

The poor came to the door, and made their rude and kindly lamentations—they were all quite sincere—"His Reverence was very good, but he couldn't have the thought, you know." It was quite true—"every one was sorry." The brave Magnolia's eyes were red, when she looked out of the window next morning, and jolly little Doctor Toole said at the Club—

"Ah, sir, she was a bright little thing—a born lady—such a beauty—and the best little creature. The town might well be proud of her, in every way, sir." And he fell a blubbering; and old Major O'Neill, who was a quiet and silent officer, cried in a reserved way, looking into the fire, with his elbow on the mantelpiece. And Toole said, "I don't know how I'll pass that house."

And many felt the same. Little Lily was there no more—and the Elms were changed—the light and the grace were gone—and they were only dark old trees now.

And who should arrive at night, with all his trunks, or at least a considerable number of them, and his books and rattle-traps, but honest, simple, Dan Loftus. The news was true about his young charge. He had died of fever at Malaga, and Dick Devereux was at last a step—and a long one—nearer to the title. So Dan was back again in his old garret. Travel had not educated him in the world's ways. In them he was the same queer, helpless tyro. And his costume, though he had a few handsome articles—was on that account, perhaps, only more grotesque than ever. But he had acquired mountains of that lore in which he and good Doctor Walsingham delighted. He had transcribed old epitaphs and translated interminable extracts from archives, and bought five Irish manuscripts, all highly illustrative of that history on which he and the Doctor were so pleasantly engaged. It was too late that night to go up to the Elms; but he longed to unpack his trunkful of manuscripts, and to expound to his beloved Doctor the treasures he had amassed.

But over his solitary tea-cup and his book the sorrowful news from the Elms reached him, and all his historical castles in the air were shivered. In the morning, before the town was stirring, he crossed the bridge, and knocked softly at the familiar hall-door. Honest old John Tracy opened it, and Dan shook hands with him, and both cried for a while quietly.

"How is the honoured master?" at last said Loftus.

"He's there in the study, sir. Thank God, you're come, sir. I'm sure he'd like to see you—I'll ask him."

Dan went to the drawing room. He looked out at the flowers, and then at the harpsichord, and on her little walnut table, where her work-basket lay, and her thimble, and the little coral necklace—a childish treasure that she used to wear when she was quite a little thing. It was like a dream; and every thing seemed to say—"poor little Lily!"

So old John came in, and "sir," said he, "the master will be glad to see you." And Dan Loftus found himself in the study; and the good Doctor and he wrung one another's hand for a long time.

"Oh, Dan—Dan—she's gone—little Lily."

"You'll see her again, sir—oh, you'll see her again."

"But, oh! was there no pitying angel to stay the blow—to plead for a few years more of life? I deserved it—oh, Dan, yea!—I know it—I deserved it. But, oh! could not the avenger have pierced me, without smiting my innocent darling?"

"Oh! she was taken in love, not in judgment, sir, my pastor—but in love. It was the voice of the Redeemer that called her."

And honest Dan repeated, through his sobs, a verse of that "Song of Songs," which little Lily had loved so well—

"My well-beloved spake, and said unto me: arise, my love, my fair one, and come thy way."

The old man bowed his sorrowful head listening.

"You never saw anything so beautiful," said he, after a while.

"I think, Dan, I could look at her for ever. I don't think it was partiality, but it seems to me there never was—I never saw a creature like her."

"Oh, noble! noble!" sobbed poor Dan.

The Doctor took him by the arm, and so into the solemn room.

"I think you'd like to see her, Dan?"

"I would—I would, indeed, sir."

And there was little Lily, never so like the lily before. Poor old Sally had laid early spring flowers on the white coverlet. A snowdrop lay by her pale little finger and thumb, just like a flower that has fall from a child's hand in its sleep. He looked at her—the white angelic apparition—a smile, or a light, upon the face.

And poor Dan, loudly crying, repeated the noble words of Paul, that have spoken down to us through the sorrows of nigh two thousand years—

“For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first.”

And so there was a little pause, and the old man said—

“It was very good of you to come to me, my good young friend, in my helplessness and shipwreck, for the Lord hath hid himself from me; but he speaks to his desolate creature, my good Dan, through your gracious lips. My faith!—I thought I had faith till it was brought to the test, and then it failed! But my good friend, Loftus, was sent to help me—to strengthen the feeble knees.”

And Dan answered, crying bitterly, and clasping the Rector's hand in both of his—

“Oh, my master, all that ever I knew of good, I learned from you, my pastor, my benefactor.”

So, with a long, last look, Dan followed the old man to the study, and they talked long there together, and then went out into the lonely garden, and paced its walks side by side, up and down.

---

CHAPTER LXXXII.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN DEVEREUX HEARS THE NEWS; AND MR. DANGERFIELD MEETS AN OLD FRIEND AFTER DINNER.

ON the night when this great sorrow visited the Elms, Captain Richard Devereux, who had heard nothing of it, was strangely saddened and disturbed in mind. They say that a distant death is sometimes felt like the shadow and chill of a passing iceberg; and if this ominous feeling crosses a mind already saddened and embittered, it overcasts it with a feeling akin to despair.

Mrs. Irons knocked at his door, and with the eagerness of a messenger of news, opened it without awaiting his answer.

"Oh, Captain, jewel, do you know what? There's poor Miss Lily Walsingham; and what do you think but she's dead—the poor little thing; gone to-night, sir—not half an hour ago."

He staggered a little, and put his hand toward his sword, like a man struck by a robber, and looked at her with a blank stare. She thought he was out of his mind, and was frightened.

"'Tis only me, sir, Mrs. Irons."

"A—thank you;" and he walked towards the chimney, and then towards the door, like a man looking for something; and on a sudden clasping his forehead in his hands, he cried a wild and terrible appeal to the Maker and Judge of all things.

"'Tis impossible—oh, no—oh, no—it's not true."

He was in the open air, he could not tell how, and across the bridge, and before the Elms—a dream—the dark Elms—dark everything.

"Oh, no—it can't be—oh, no—oh, no;" and he went on saying as he stared on the old house, dark against the sky; "Oh, no—oh, no."

Two or three times he would have gone over to the hall-door to make inquiry, but he sickened at the thought. He clung to that hope, which was yet not a hope, and he turned and walked quickly down the river's side by the Inchicore-road. But the anguish of suspense soon drew him back again; and now his speech was changed, and he said—

"Yes, she's gone—she's gone—oh, she's gone—she's certainly gone."

He found himself at the drawing-room window that looked into the little garden at the front of the house, and tapping at the window-pane. He remembered, all on a sudden—it was like waking—how strange was such a summons. A little after saw a light crossing the hall, and he rang the door-bell. John Tracy opened the door. Yes, it was all true.

The Captain was looking very pale, John thought, but otherwise much as usual. He stared at the old servant for some seconds after he told him all, but said nothing, not even good-night, and turned away.

It was not till he had got nearly across the bridge, that Captain Devereux, as it were, waked up. It was no good waking. He broke forth into a sheer fury. It is not my business to note down the horrors of this impious frenzy. It was near five o'clock when he came back to his lodgings; and then, not to rest. To sit down, to rise again, to walk round the room and round, and stop on a sudden at the window, leaning his elbows on the sash, with hands clenched together, and teeth set; and so those demoniac hours of night and solitude wore slowly away, and the cold gray stole over the east, and Devereux drank a deep draught of his fiery Lethe, and cast himself down on his bed, and fell at once into a deep, exhausted lethargy.

When his servant came to his bed-side at seven o'clock, he was lying motionless, with flushed cheeks, and he could not rouse him. Perhaps it was well, and saved him from brain-fever, or madness.

This morning several of the neighbours went into Dublin, for the bills were to be presented against Charles Nutter for a murderous assault, with intent to kill, made upon the person of Barnabas Sturk, Esq., Doctor of Medicine, and Surgeon of the Royal Irish Artillery. As the day wore on, the honest gossips of Chapelized looked out anxiously for news. And every body who met any one else asked him—"Any news about Nutter, eh?"—and then they would stop to speculate—and then one would wonder that Dr. Walsingham's man, Clinton, had not yet returned—and the other would look at his watch and say 'twas one o'clock—and then both agreed that Spaight, at all events, must soon come—for he has appointed two o'clock for looking at that brood mare of Fagan's.

At last, sure enough, Spaight appeared. Toole, who had been detained by business in another quarter, had ridden into the town from Leixlip, and was now dismounted and talking with Major O'Neill upon the absorbing topic. These cronies saw Spaight at the turnpike, and as he showed his ticket, he talked with the man. Of course, the news was come. The turnpike-man knew it by this time; and off scampered Toole, and the Major followed close at his heels, at double-quick. He made a dismal shake or two of his head, and lifted his hand as they drew near. Toole's heart misgave him.

"Well, how is it?—what's the news?" he panted.

"A true bill," answered Spaight, with a solemn stare; "a true bill, sir."

Toole uttered an oath of consternation, and, taking the words out of Spaight's mouth, told the news to the Major.

"Do you tell me so?" exclaimed the Major. "Bedad, sir, I'm uncommon sorry."

"A bad business, sir," observed Spaight.

"Tis mighty slender evidencee to take a man's life on," said Toole, with some disgust. "Be the law, sir, the whole thing gives me a complete turn. Are you to dine with Colonel Strafford to-day?"

"I am, sir," said the Major; "an' it goes again the Colonel's grain to have a party at all just now, with the respect he has for the family up there," and he nodded, pensively, toward the Elma. "But he asked Lowe ten days ago, and Mr. Dangerfield, and two or three more; and, you know, he could not put them off on that ground—there being no relationship, you see—and, pon my oath, sir, I'd rather not go myself, just now."

That evening, at five o'clock, Colonel Strafford's dinner party assembled at the King's House. The Colonel was a serene man, and hospitality—even had he been in the dumps—demands her sacrifices. He, therefore, did the honors as be seemed a genial and courteous old officer of the Royal Irish Artillery. Mr. Justice Lowe was there, and Mr. Dangerfield, and old Colonel Bligh, of the Magazine, and honest Major O'Neill, notwithstanding his low spirits. Perhaps they required keeping up; and claret like Colonel Strafford's is consoling.

The talk turned, of course, a good deal on Charles Nutter; and Mr. Dangerfield, who was in particularly pleasant spirits, except when unfortunate Nutter was actually under discussion—when he grew grave and properly saddened—told, in his clear, biting way, a curious rosary of Newgate stories—of highwaymen's disguises—of clever constables—of circumstantial evidence marvellously elicited, and exquisitely put together—of monsters, long concealed, drawn from the deep by the finest tackle, into upper light, and dropped deftly into the landing-net of Justice. These curious anecdotes tickled Lowe mightily, who quite enjoyed himself, and laughed more than his friend Colonel Strafford ever remembered to have heard him before, over some of the ingenious stratagems described so neatly by Dangerfield. And Lowe actually, having obtained Colonel Strafford's leave, proposed that gallant officer's health in a bumper, and took occasion to mention their obligations to him for having afforded them the opportunity of enjoying Mr. Dangerfield's sprightly and instructive sallies; and hoped, with all his heart, that the neighbourhood was long to enjoy the advantage and pleasure of his residence among them. And Mr. Dangerfield replied gaily, that all that was needed to make such sweet scenery and charming company as the place commanded absolutely irresistible, was the sense of safety conferred by the presence of such a magistrate as Mr. Lowe, and the convivial inspiration of such wine as their gallant host provided; and that, for his part, nothing would better please him than to spend the residue of his days amidst the lively quietude of their virtuous and hilarious neighbourhood; and some more to the like purpose, which pleased the good company highly, who all agreed that this white gentleman—fluent, easy, and pointed in his delivery—was a mighty fine speaker, indeed.

Lowe was mightily taken with him. There was little warmth or veneration in that hard justice's nature. But Mr. Dangerfield had a way with him that few men with any sort of taste for the knowledge of evil could resist; and the cold-eyed justice of the peace hung on his words with an attentive rapture; and was really sorry, and shook him admiringly by the hand, when Dangerfield, who had special business at home, rose up in his brisk way, and flashed a farewell over the company from his spectacles.

"If Mr. Dangerfield really means to stay here, he must apply for the commission of the peace," said Mr. Lowe, so soon as the door shut. "We must put it upon him. I protest I never met a man so fitted by nature and acquirements to make a perfectly useful magistrate. He and I, sir, between us, we'd give a good account of this part of the country; and there's plenty of work, sir, if 'twere only between this and Dublin; and, by George, sir, he's a wonderful diverting fellow, full of anecdote. Wonderful place London, to be sure."

"And a good man, too, in a quiet way," said Colonel Stafford, who could state a fact. "'Tisn't every rich man has the heart to part with his money as he does; he has done many charities here, and especially he has been most bountiful to poor Stark's family."

And thus it is, as the foul fiend, when he vanishes, leaves a smell of brimstone after him, a good man leaves a fragrance; and the company in the parlour enjoyed the aroma of Mr. Dangerfield's virtues, as he buttoned his white surtout over his breast, and dropt his vails into the palms of the butler and footman in the hall.

It was a clear, frosty, star-lit night. White and stern was the face which he turned upward for a moment to the sky. He paused for a second in the ray of candlelight that gleamed through Puddock's window-shutter, and glanced on the pale dial of his large gold watch. It was only half-past eight o'clock. He walked on, glancing back over his shoulder, along the Dublin road.

"The drunken beast. My mind misgives me he'll disappoint," muttered the silver spectacles, gliding briskly onward.

When he reached the main street he peered curiously before him under the village tree, in quest of carriage lights.

"A lawless brute like that may be before his time as well as after." So he walked briskly forward, and up Sturk's door-steps, and knocked.

"The Dublin doctor hasn't come—eh?" he asked.

"No, sir, he isn't come yet—'twas nine o'clock, the mistress told me."

"Very good. Tell Mrs. Sturk, pray, that I, Mr. Dangerfield, you know, will call, as I promised, at nine o'clock precisely."

And he turned again, and walked briskly over the bridge, and away along the Inchicore road overhanging the river. All was silent there. Not a step but his own was stirring, and the road in places so overhung with old trees that it was difficult to see a yard before one.

He slackened his pace, and listened, like a man who keeps an assignation, and listened again, and laughed under his breath; and sure enough, before long, the clink of a footstep was heard approaching swiftly from the Dublin direction.

Mr. Dangerfield drew aside under the deep shadow of a high hawthorn hedge, overhung by trees; and watching intently, he saw a tall, lank figure, with a peculiar gait and stoop of its own, glide steadily by.

The tall figure was that of our old friend, Zekiel Irons, the clerk. A sable form, as becomed his ecclesiastical calling; and now a white figure was gliding without noise swiftly after him.

Suddenly, as he reached an open part of the road, a thin hand was laid on his shoulder, and, with a start, and a "hollo," he sprang round.

"Hey! why, you're as frightened as if you had seen Charles—Charles Nutter. Hey!—don't be uneasy, I heard from the parson yesterday morning you were to be with him to-night before nine o'clock, about that money you left in his hands, and I've chanced to meet you; and this I want you to understand, Charles Nutter is in gaol, and we must not let him get out—do you see. That business settled, we're at rest. So, Mr. Irons, you must not show the white feather. Be bold—speak out what you know—now's the time to strike. I'll put your evidence, as you reported it to me, into shape, and you come to me to-morrow morning at eight o'clock; and mind you, I'll reward you this time, and better than ever you've fared before. Go on. Or stay—I'll go before."

And Mr. Dangerfield laughed one of his chilly laughs—and, with a nod to Irons, repeated—"eight o'clock"—and so walked on a little bit.

The clerk had not said a word. A perspiration broke forth on his forehead, and, wiping the drops away, he said—

"Lord have mercy upon us—Lord deliver us—Lord have mercy upon us," like a man dying.

Mr. Dangerfield's bold proposition seemed quite to overpower and unman him.

The white figure turned short, facing the clerk, and, said he—

"See you, Mr. Irons, I'm serious—there must be no shirking. If you undertake, you must go through; and, hark! in your ear—you shall have five hundred pounds. I put no constraint—say yes or no—if you don't like you needn't. Justice, I think, will be done even without your help. But till he's quiet—you understand—nothing's sure."

"Lord have mercy on us!" muttered Irons, with a groan.

"There, 'tis enough—if you have nerve to speak truth and do justice, you have the money. We're men of business—you and I. If not, I shan't trouble you any more. If you like it, come to me at eight o'clock in the morning; if not, why, stay away, and no harm's done."

And with these words, Mr. Dangerfield turned on his heel once more, and started at a lively pace for Chapelizod.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

IN WHICH MR. PAUL DANGERFIELD MOUNTS THE STAIRS OF THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD, AND MAKES SOME ARRANGEMENTS.

THE white figure glided duskily over the bridge. The river rushed beneath in Egyptian darkness. The air was still, and a thousand celestial eyes twinkled down brightly through the clear deep sky upon the actors in this true story. He kept the left side, so that the road lay between him and the Phoenix door, which gaped wide with a great hospitable grin, and crimsoned the night air with a glow of candlelight.

The white figure turned the corner, and glided onward in a straight, swift line to the door of Dr. Sturk.

He knocked softly at the hall-door, and swiftly stepped in and shut it.

"How's your master?"

"Jist the same way, plaze yer honour; jist sleepin'—still sleepin'—sleepin' always," answered the maid.

"Has the Dublin doctor come?"

"No."

"The mistress—where's she?"

"In the room, sir, with the mather."

"Present my service to her—Mr. Dangerfield's compliments, you know—and say I await her permission to come up stairs."

Presently the maid returned, with poor Mrs. Sturk's invitation to Mr. Dangerfield to walk up.

Up he went, leaving his white surtout and cocked-hat in the hall, and entered the chamber where pale little Mrs. Sturk, who had been crying a great deal, sat in a dingy old tabby saque, by the light of a solitary mould-candle at the bed-side of the noble Barney.

"Dr. Dillon not yet arrived, madam? Well, 'tis precisely his hour; we shall have him soon. How does the patient? Ha! just as usual. How!—why there's a change, isn't there?"

"As how, sir?" inquired Mrs. Sturk, with a scared look.

"Why, don't you see? But you mustn't be frightened; there's one coming in whom I have every confidence."

"I don't see, sir. What is it Mr. Dangerfield? Oh, pray, sir!"

"Why—a—nothing very particular, only he looks more languid than when I saw him last, and discoloured somewhat, and his face more sunk, I think—eh?"

"Oh, no, sir—'tis this bad light—nothing more, indeed, sir. This evening, I assure you, Mr. Dangerfield, at three o'clock, when the sun was shining, we were all remarking how well he looked—I never saw—you'd have said so—such a wonderful improvement."

And he snuffed the candle, and held it up over Barney's grim features.

In the meantime Dangerfield was feeling his pulse, with his watch in the hollow of his hand.

"And aren't they better—his pulse, sir—they were stronger this morning by a great deal than last night—it was just at ten o'clock—don't you perceive, sir?"

H'm—well, I hope, ma'am, we'll soon find all better. Now, have you got all things ready—you have, of course, a sheet well aired?"

"A sheet—I did not know 'twas wanted."

"Hey, this will never do, my dear madam—he'll be here and nothing ready; and you'll do well to send over to the mess-room for a lump of ice. 'Tis five minutes past nine. If you'll see to these things, I'll sit here, madam, and take the best care of the patient—and, d'ye see, Mistress Stark, 'twill be necessary that you take care that Toole hears nothing of Dr. Dillon's coming."

So with a little more talk, Mrs. Stark, calling one of her maids, and leaving the little girl in charge of the nursery, ran down with noiseless steps and care-worn face to the kitchen, and Mr. Dangerfield was left alone in the chamber with the spell-bound sleeper on the bed.

In about ten seconds he rose sharply from his chair and listened; then very noiselessly they stepped to the door and listened again, and gently shut it.

Then Mr. Dangerfield moved to the window. There was a round hole in the shutter, and through it he glanced into the street, and was satisfied.

By this time he had his white pocket-handkerchief in his hands. He folded it deftly across and across into a small square, and then the spectacles flashed coldly on the image of Dr. Stark, and then on the door; and there was a pause.

"What's that?" he muttered sharply, and listened for a second or two. It was only one of the children crying in the nursery. The sound subsided.

So with another long silent step, he stood by the capriole-legged old mahogany table, with the scallop shell containing a piece of soap and a wash-ball, and the basin with its jug of water standing therein. Again he listened while you might count two, and dipped the handkerchief, so folded, into the water, and quietly squeezed it; and stood white and glittering by Stark's bed-side.

People moved very noiselessly about that house, and scarcely a minute had passed when the door opened softly, and the fair Magnolia Macnamara popped in her glowing face and brilliant glance, and whispered.

"Are you there, Mrs. Stark, dear?"

At the far side of the bed, Dangerfield, with his flashing spectacles and snowy aspect, and a sort of pant, rose up straight and looked into her eyes, like a white bird of prey disturbed over its carrion.

She uttered a little scream—quite pale on a sudden—for she did not recognize the sinister phantom who glimmered at her over the prostrate Sturk.

But Dangerfield laughed his quiet hollow “ha! ha! ha!” and said promptly,

“A strange old nurse I make, Miss Macnamara. But what can I do, Mrs. Sturk has left me in charge, and faith I believe our patient’s looking mighty badly.”

He had observed Miss Mag glancing from him to the dumb figure in the bed with a puzzled kind of horror.

The fact is, Sturk’s face had a leaden tint; he looked, evidently enough, even in that dim candlelight, a great deal worse than the curious Miss Mag was accustomed to see him.

“He’s very low, to-night, and seems oppressed, and his pulse are failing; in fact, my dear young lady, he’s plainly worse to-night than I like to tell poor Mrs. Sturk, you understand.”

“And his face looks so shiny and damp-like,” said Miss Mag, with a horrible sort of scrutiny.

“Exactly so, Miss, ’tis weakness,” observed Dangerfield.

“And you were wiping it with your pocket-handkerchief when I looked in,” continued Miss Mag.

“Was I—ha, ha—’tis wonderful how quick we learn a new business. I vow I begin to think I should make a very respectable nurse-tender.”

“And what the dickens brings him up here?” asked Miss Mag of herself; so soon as the first shock was over, the oddity of the situation struck her as she looked with perplexed and unpleasant sort of inquiry at Mr. Dangerfield.

Just then up came the meek little Mrs. Sturk, and the gentleman greeted her with a “Well, madam, I have not left his bedside since you went down; and I think he looks a little better—just a little—eh?”

“I trust and pray, sir, that when the Doctor”—began

Mrs. Sturk, and stopped short, for Mr. Dangerfield frowned quickly, and pointed towards Miss Mag, who was now, after her wont, looking round the room for matter of interest.

"And is Pell comin' out to-night?" asked Miss Mag, quickly.

"No, truly, madam," answered the gentleman, "Dr. Pell's not coming—is he, Mrs. Sturk?"

"Dr. Pell!—oh, la—no, sir. No, my dear." And, after a pause, "Oh, ho. I wish it was over," she groaned, with her hand pressed to her side, looking with a kind of agony on Sturk.

"What over?" asked Miss Mag.

Just then a double-knock came to the hall-door, and Mr. Dangerfield signed sternly to Mrs. Sturk, who first stood up, with her eyes and mouth wide open, and then sat down, like a woman going to faint.

But the maid came up and told Miss Mag that her mother and Lieutenant O'Flaherty were waiting on the steps for her; and so, though loath to go unsatisfied, away she went, with a courtesy to Mr. Dangerfield and a kiss to Miss Sturk, who revived on hearing it was only her fat kindly neighbour from over the way, instead of Black Doctor Dillon, with his murderous case of instruments.

The gentleman in the silver spectacles accompanied her to the lobby, and offered his hand; but she dispensed with his attendance, and jumped down the stairs, with one hand to the wall and the other on the banisters, nearly a flight at a time; and the cackle of voices rose from the hall-door, which quickly shut, and the fair vision had vanished.

Dangerfield's silver spectacles gleamed phosphorically after her from under his lurid forehead. It was not a pleasant look, and his mouth was very grim. In another instant he was in the room again, and glanced at his watch.

"'Tis half-past nine," he said, in a quiet tone, but with a gleam of intense fury over his face, "and that—that—Doctor named nine."

Dangerfield waited, and talked a little to Mrs. Sturk and the maid, who were now making preparations, in short sentences, by fits and starts of half-a-dozen words at a time. He had commenced his visit ceremoniously, but now he grew brusque, and took the command; and his tones were prompt and stern, and the women grew afraid of him.

Ten o'clock came. Dangerfield went down stairs, and looked from the drawing-room windows. He waxed more and more impatient. Down he went to the street. He did not care to walk towards the King's House, which lay on the road to Dublin; he did not choose to meet his boon companions again, but he stood for full ten minutes, with one of Dr. Sturk's military cloaks about him, under the village tree, directing double-fire of his spectacles down the street, with an incensed steadiness, unrewarded, unrelieved. Not a glimmer of a link; not a distant rumble of a coach-wheel.

Mr. Dangerfield was not given to bluster, and never made a noise; but from his hollow jaws he sighed an icy curse towards Dublin, which had a keener edge than all the roaring blasphemies of Donnybrook together; and, with another shadow upon his white face, he re-entered the house.

"He'll not come to-night, ma'am," he said with a cold abruptness.

"Oh, thank Heaven!—that is—I'm so afraid—I mean about the operation."

At half-past ten o'clock, Mr. Dangerfield abandoned hope. Had it been Dr. Pell, indeed, it would have been otherwise. But Black Dillon had not a patient; his fame was in the hospitals. There was nothing to detain him but his vices, and five hundred pounds to draw him to Chapelizod. He had not come. He must be either brained in a row, or drunk under a table. So Mr. Dangerfield took leave of good Mrs. Sturk, having told her in case the Doctor should come, to make him wait for his arrival before taking any measures, and directing that he should be sent for immediately.

So Mr. Dangerfield got into his white surtoat silently in the hall, and shut the door quickly after him, and waited, a grim sentry, under the tree, with his face towards Dublin. Father Time had not blunted the white gentleman's perceptions, touched his ear with his numb fingers, or blown the smoke of his tobacco-pipe into his eyes. He was keen of eye, sharp of hearing; but neither sight nor sound rewarded him, and so he turned, after a few minutes, and glided away, like a white ghost, toward the Brass Castle.

In less than five minutes after, the thunder of a coach shook Dr. Sturk's windows, followed by a rousing peal on the hall-door, and Dr. Dillon, in dingy splendours, and a great dragged wig, with a gold-headed cane in his bony hand, stepped in; and, diffusing a reek of whisky-punch, and with a case of instruments under his arm, pierced the maid who opened the door, through, with his prominent black eyes, and frightened her with his fiery face, while he demanded to see Mrs. Sturk, and lounged, without ceremony, into the parlour; where he threw himself on the sofa, with one of his bony legs extended on it, and his great ugly hand under his wig scratching his head.

---

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

IN WHICH TWO COMRADES ARE TETE-A-TETE IN THEIR OLD QUARTERS, AND DOCTOR STURK'S CUE IS CUT OFF, AND A CONSULTATION COMMENCES.

THE buzz of a village, like the hum of a city, represents a very wonderful variety of human accent and feeling. It is marvellous how few families thrown together will suffice to furnish forth this dubia cœna of sweets and bitters. On this night, as usual, there rose up towards the stars a throbbing murmur from our village—a wild chaos of sound, which we must strive to analyse, extracting from the hurly-burly each separate tune it may concern us to hear.

Captain Devereux was in his lodging. He was comparatively tranquil now; but a savage and impious despair possessed him. Serene outwardly—he would not let the vulgar see his scars and sores; and was one of those proud spirits who build to themselves desolate places.

Little Puddock was the man with whom he had least reserve. Puddock was so kindly, and so true and secret, and cherished, beside, so great an admiration for him, that he greeted him rather kindly at a moment when another visiter would have fared scurvily enough. Puddock was painfully struck with his pallor, his wild and haggard eye, and something stern and brooding in his handsome face.

"I've been thinking, Puddock," he said; "and thought with me has grown strangely like despair—and that's all. Why, man, think—what is there for me?—all my best stakes I've lost already; and I'm fast losing myself. How different, sir, is my fate from others? Worse men than I—every way incomparably worse—and, d—— them, they prosper, while I go down the tide. 'Tisn't just!" And he swore a great oath. "'Tis enough to make a man blaspheme. I've done with life—I hate it. I'll volunteer. 'Tis my first thought in the morning, and my last at night, how well I'd like a bullet through my brain or heart."

"You must not talk that way, Devereux," still a good deal more dismayed by his looks than his words. "Why are you so troubled with vapours and blue devils?"

"Nowhy!" said Devereux, with a grim smile.

"My dear Devereux, I say, you mustn't talk in that wild way. You—you talk like a ruined man!"

"And I so comfortable!"

"Why, to be sure, Dick, you have had some little rubs, and, maybe, your follies and your vexations; but, hang it, you are young; you can't get experience—at least, so I've found it—without paying for it. You mayn't like it just now ; but it's well worth the cost. Your worries and miscarriages, dear Richard, will make you steady."

On a sudden, says the Captain, "My dear little Puddock," and he took him by the hand, with a sort of sarcastic flicker of a smile, and looked in his face almost contemptuously ; but his eyes and voice softened before the unconscious bonhomie of the true little gentleman. "Puddock, Puddock, did it never strike you, my boy, that Hamlet never strives to speak a word of comfort to the ghost of the forlorn old Daue. He felt it would not do. Every man that's worth a button knows his own case best ; and I know the secrets of my own prison-house.

"Puddock, throw up that window, the room's too hot—or, stay, never mind ; read a book, Puddock—you like it, and I'll stroll a little along the path, and find you when I come back."

"Why it's dark," remonstrated his visiter.

"Dark ? I dare say—yes, of course—very dark—but cool ; the air is cool."

He talked like a man who was thinking of something else ; and Puddock thought how strangely handsome he looked, with that pale dash of horror, like King Saul when the evil spirit was upon him ; and there was a terrible misgiving in his mind. What could he mean by walking, at that hour, alone, by the river's brink ? Puddock, with a sinking and flutter at his heart, unperceived, followed him down stairs, and was beside him in the street.

"The path by the river ?" said Puddock.

"The river—the path ? Yes, sir, the path by the river. I thought I left you up stairs," said Devereux, with an old sort of sulky shrinking.

"Why, Devereux, I may as well walk with you, if you don't object," lisped Puddock.

"But I do object, sir," cried Devereux, suddenly, in a fierce high key, turning upon his little comrade. "What d'ye mean, sir? You think I mean to—to drown myself—ha, ha, ha! or what the devil's running in your head? I'm not a madman, sir, nor you a mad doctor. Go home, sir—or go to—to where you will, sir; only go your own way, and leave me mine."

"Ah, Devereux, you're very quick with me," said Puddock, placing his plump little hand on Devereux's arm, and looking very gently and gravely in his face.

Devereux laid his hand upon Puddock's collar with an agitated sort of sneer. But he recollected himself, and that diabolical gloom faded from his face, and he looked more like himself, and slid his cold hand silently into little Puddock's; and so they stood for a while, by the door-step, to the admiration of Mrs. Irons—whom Devereux's high tones had called to her window.

"Puddock, I don't think I'm well, and I don't know quite what I've been saying. I ask your pardon. You've always been very good to me, Puddock. I believe—I believe—I believe you're the only friend I have, and—Puddock, you won't leave me."

So up stairs they went together; and Mrs. Irons, from what she had overheard, considered herself justified in saying, that "Captain Devereux was for drowning himself in the Liffey, and would have done so only for Lieutenant Puddock." And so the report was set a-going round the garrulous town of Chapelizod.

As Mr. Dangerfield glided rapidly along the silent road towards the Brass Castle, the little gate of his now leafless flower-garden being already in sight, he saw a dark figure awaiting him under the bushes which overhung it. It was Mr. Irons, who came forward, without speaking, and lifted his hat respectfully, perhaps abjectly, and paused for recognition.

"Hey, Irons?" said Mr. Dangerfield.

"At your service, sir."

"Well, and what says his worship?" asked the gentleman, playfully.

"I wanted to tell your honour that it won't make no odds, and I'll do it."

"Of course. You're right. It does make no odds. He'll hang whatever you do; and I tell you 'tis well he should, and only right you speak the truth, too—'twill make assurance doubly sure."

"At eight o'clock in the morning, sir, I'll attend you," said Irons, with a sort of shiver.

"Good! and I'll jot down your evidence, and we'll drive to Mr. Lowe's, to Lucan, and you shall swear before him. And, you understand—I don't forget what I promised—you'll be a happier man every way for having done your duty; and here's half-a-crown to spend in the Salinon House."

Irons only moaned, and then said—

"That's all, sir. But I couldn't feel easy till it was off my mind."

"At eight o'clock I shall expect you. Good night, Irons."

And with his hands in his pockets he watched Irons off the ground. His visage darkened as for a while his steady gaze was turned towards Dublin. He was not quite so comfortable as he might have been.

Meanwhile Black Dillon, at Mrs. Sturk's request, had stalked up-stairs to the patient's bed-side, "Had not I best send at once for Mr. Dangerfield?" she inquired.

"No occasion, ma'am," replied the eminent, but slightly fuddled "Saw-bones" "until I see whether I'll operate to-night. What's in that jug, ma'am? Chicken-broth? That'll do. Give him a spoonful. See—he swallows free enough;" and then Black Dillon plucked up his eyelids with a roughness that terrified the reverential and loving Mrs. Sturk, and examined the distorted pupils.

"No convulsions, ma'am?"

"Oh, no, sir, thank heaven!—nothing in the least—only quiet sleep, sir; just like that."

"Sleep, indeed—that's no sleep, ma'am. Booboh! I couldn't bawl that way in his face, ma'am, without disturbing him, ma'am, if it was. Now we'll get him up a bit—there, that's right—aisy. He was lying, ma'am, I understand, on his back, when they found him in the park, ma'am—so Mr. Dangerfield says—ay. Well, slip the cap off—backward—that'll do. Who plastered his head, ma'am ? ”

“ Doctor Toole, sir,”

“ Toole—Toole—h'm—I see—hey—hi—tut ! 'tis the devil's pair of fractures, ma'am.”

And he plucked off two or three strips of plaster with a quick whisk, which made poor little Mrs. Sturk wince and cry, “ Oh, dear, sir ! ”

“ Threpan, indeed ! ” Murnured Black Dillon, with a course sneer, “ did they run the scalpel anywhere over the occiput, ma'am ? ”

“ I—I—truly, sir—I'm not sure,” answered Mrs. Sturk, who did not perfectly understand a word he said.

The doctor's hair had not been cut behind. Poor Mrs. Sturk, expecting his recovery every day, would not have permitted the sacrilege, and his dishevelled cue lay under his shoulders. With his straight surgical scissors Black Dillon snipt off this sacred appendage before the good lady knew what he was about, and cropt the back of his head down to the closest stubble.

“ Will you send, if you please, ma'am, for Doctor—Doctor—thingumee ! ”

“ Doctor Toole ? ” inquired Mrs. Sturk.

“ Doctqr Toole, ma'am ; yes,” answered the surgeon.

He himself went down to the coach at the hall-door, and in a few moments returned with a case, and something in a cloth. From the cloth he took an apparatus ; like the cushioned back of a chair, with straps and buckles attached to it, and a sort of socket, the back of which was opened, being intended to receive the head in.

“ Now, ma'am, we'll prop him up comfortable with this, if you please.”

And having got it into place, and lowered by a screw, the cushions intended to receive his head, and got the lethargic trunk and skull of the artillery Doctor well-placed for his purpose, he took out a roll of sticking-plaster and a great piece of lint, and laid them on the table, and unlocked his box, and took out several instruments, silver-mounted, straight and crooked, with awful adaptations to unknown butcheries and tortures, and then out came another—the veritable trepan—resembling the homely bit-and-brace, but slender, sinister, and quaint, with a murderous sort of elegance.

“You may as well order in half-a-dozen clean towels, if you please, ma’am.”

“Oh! Doctor, you’re not going to have an operation to-night,” gasped Mrs. Sturk, her face quite white and damp, and her clasped hands trembling.

“Twenty to one, ma’am,” he replied, with a slight hiccup, “we’ll have nothing of the kind; but have them here, ma’am, and some warm water for fear of accidents—though maybe ’tis only for a ddrop of punch we’ll be wanting it,” and his huge thirsty mouth grinned facetiously; and just then Doctor Toole entered the room. He was confoundedly surprised when he found Black Dillon there. Though bent on meeting him with hauteur and proper reserve, he was yet cowed by his superior knowledge, so that Tom Toole’s address was strangely chequered with pomposity and alarm.

Dillon’s credentials there was, indeed, no disputing, so they sent for Moore, the barber; and, while he was coming, they put the women out of the room, and sat in consultation.

---

CHAPTER LXXXV.

IN WHICH MR. MOORE THE BARBER ARRIVES, AND THE MEDICAL GENTLEMEN LOOK THE DOOR.

THE ladies were not much the wiser, though, I confess, they were not far removed from the door. The great men inside talked indistinctly and technically, and once Doctor Dillon was so unfeeling as to crack a joke—they could not distinctly hear what—and he-haw brutally over it. And poor little Mrs. Sturk was taken with a great palpitation, and looked as white as a ghost, and was, indeed, so obviously at the point of swooning that her women would have removed her to the nursery and placed her on the bed, but that such a procedure would have obliged them to leave the door of their sick master's room, just then a point of too lively interest to be deserted. So they consoled their mistress, and supported her with such strong moral cordials as compassionate persons in their rank and circumstances are prompt to administer.

"Oh! ma'am, jewel, don't be takin' it to heart that way—though, dear knows, 'tis no way surprisin' you would; for may I never sin if ever I seen such a murtherin' steel gimblet as the red-faced docthor—I mane the Dublin man—has out o' the table beside the poor masther—'tid frighten the hangman to look at it—an' six towels, too! Why, ma'am, dear, if 'twas what they wor goin' to slaughter a bullock they wouldn't ax more nor that."

"Oh! don't. Oh! Katty, Katty—don't, oh! don't."

At this moment the door opened, and Doctor Dillon's carbuncled visage and glowing eyes appeared.

"Is there a steady woman there—not a child, you know, ma'am? A—you'll do (to Katty). Come in here, if you please, and we'll tell you what you're to do."

So, being nothing loath, she made her courtsey and glided in.

"Oh! doctor," gasped poor Mrs. Sturk, holding by the hem of his garment, "do you think it will kill him?"

"No, ma'am—not to-night, at any rate," he answered, drawing back; but she still held him.

"Oh! doctor, you think it will kill him."

"No, ma'am—there's always some danger."

"Danger of what, sir?"

"Fungus, ma'am—if he gets over the chance of inflammation. But, on the other hand, ma'am, we may do him a power of good; and see, ma'am, 'twill be the best for you to go down or into the nursery, and we'll call you, ma'am, if need be—that is if he's better, ma'am, as we hope."

"Oh! Mr. Moore, it's you," sobbed the poor lady, holding fast by the sleeve of the barber, who that moment, with many reverences and "your servant, ma'am," had mounted to the lobby with the look of awe-struck curiosity, in his long, honest face, which the solemn circumstances of his visit warranted.

"You're the man we sent for?" demanded Dillon, gruffly.

"'Tis good Mr. Moore," cried trembling little Mrs. Sturk, deprecating and wheedling him instinctively to make him of her side, and lead him to take part with her and resist all violence to her husband.

"Why don't you spake, sor-r-r? Are you the barber we sent for or no? What ails you, man?" demanded the savage, Doctor Dillon, in a suppressed roar.

"At your service, ma'am—sir," replied Moore with submissive alacrity.

"Come in here, then. Come in, will you?" cried the doctor, hauling him with his great red hand.

"There now—there now—there—there," he said gruffly, extending his palm to keep off poor Mrs. Sturk.

So he shut the door, and poor Mrs. Sturk heard him draw the bolt, and felt that her Barney had passed out of her hands, and that she could do nothing for him now but only clasp her hands and gasp up her prayers for his deliverance.

So she heard them walking this way and that, but could not distinguish what they said, only she heard them talking; and once or twice a word reached her, but not very intelligible, such as—

“’Twas Surgeon Beauchamp’s—see that.”

“Mighty curious.”

Then a lot of mumbling, and “Cruciform, of course.”

And then a little more mumbled dialogue, and she thought she heard—

“Begin now.”

And there was a dead silence of many seconds; and Mrs. Sturk felt as if she must scream, and her heart beat at a gallop, and her dry, white lips silently called upon her Maker for help, and she felt quite wild, and very faint; and heard them speak brief and low together, and then another long silence; and then a loud voice, in a sort of shriek, cry out that name—holy and awful—which we do not mix in tales like this. It was Sturk’s voice; and he cried in the same horrid shriek, “Murder—mercy—Mr. Archer.”

And poor Mrs. Sturk, with a loud hysterical cry, that quivered with her agony, answered from without, and wildly rattled at the door-handle, and pushed with all her feeble force to get in, in a kind of crescendo screaming—“Oh, Barney—Barney—Barney—sweetheart—what are they doing?”

And the doctors’ voices were now heard plainly enough soothing the patient, and he seemed to have grown more collected; and she heard him—she thought—repeat a snatch of a prayer, as a man might just rescued from a shipwreck; and he said in a tone more natural in one so sick and weak, “I’m a dead man—he’s done it—where is he?—he’s murdered me.”

“Who?” demanded Toole’s well-known voice.

“Archer—the villain—Charles Archer.”

“Give me the cup with the claret and water, and the spoon—there it is,” said Dillon’s rough bass tones.

And then she heard the maid's step crossing the floor, and then there was a groan from Sturk.

Just then Toole opened the door enough to put his head through, and gently restraining poor Mrs. Sturk with his hand, he said with a vigorous whisper—

"'Twill all go well, ma'am, we hope, if he's not agitated; you must not go in, ma'am nor talk to him—by-and-bye you may see him, but he must be quiet now; his pulse are very regular at present—but you see, ma'am, we can't be too cautious."

While Toole was thus discoursing her at the door, she heard Dr. Dillon washing his hands, and Sturk's familiar voice sounding so strange after the long silence, say very languidly and slowly.

"Take a pen, sir—some one—take and write—write down what I say."

"Now, ma'am, you see he's bent on talking," said Toole, whose quick ear caught the promise of a revelation. "I must be at my post, ma'am."

And Toole closed the door again, and they heard Sturk murmur something more; and then the maid, who was within, was let out by Toole, and the door closed and bolted again, and a sort of cooing and murmuring recommenced.

After a while, Toole absolutely pale, and looking very stern, opened the door, and, said he, in a quiet way—

"Ma'am, may I send Katty down to the King's House, with a note to Mr.—a note to the King's House—ma'am—I thank you—and see, Katty, good girl, ask to see the gentleman himself, and take his answer from his own lips."

And he tore off the back of a letter, and pencilled on it these words—

"MY DEAR SIR,—Dr. Sturk has been successfully operated upon by me and another gentleman; and being restored to speech and recollection, but very weak, desires earnestly to see you, and make an important disclosure to you as a justice of the peace.

"I am, sir, your very obedient, humble servant,

"THOMAS TOOLE."

Upon this note he clapt a large seal with the Toole arms, and when it was complete, placed it in the hands of Katty, who, with her riding-hood on, and her head within it teeming with all sorts of wild conjectures and horrible images, and her whole soul in a whirl of curiosity, hurried along the Dublin road to the gate of the King's House. The hall-door of this hospitable mansion stood open, and a flood of red candle-light fell upon one side of the gray horse, saddle, and holster pipes, which waited the descent of Mr. Lowe, who was shaking hands with the hospitable Colonel at the threshold.

Katty was just in time, and the booted gentleman, in his surtout and cape, strode back again into the light of the hall-door, and breaking the seal, there read the lines which Toole had pencill'd, and thrusting it into his coat pocket, and receiving again the fuddled butler's benedictions—he had given him half-a-crown—he mounted his gray steed, and at a brisk trot, followed by his servant, was, in little more than two minutes' time, at Dr. Sturk's door.

Doctor Toole met Mr. Lowe on the lobby; he was doing the honours of the ghastly eclaireissement, and bowed him up to the room, with many an intervening whisper, and a sort of apology for Dillon, whom he treated as quite unrepresentable, and resolved to keep as much as practicable in the background.

But that gentleman, who exulted in a good stroke of surgery, and had no sort of professional delicacy, calling his absent fathers and brethren of the scalpel and forceps by confounded hard names when he detected a blunder or hit a blot of theirs, met Mr. Lowe on the upper lobby.

"Your servant, sir," says he, rubbing his great red hands with a moist grin; "you see what I've done. Pell's no surgeon, no more than that candlestick! to think of him never looking at the occiput; and he found lying on his back—'twas well Mr. Dangerfield pitched on me—a depression, the size of a shilling in the back of the head—a bit of depressed bone, you see, over the cerebellum—the trepan has relieved him."

"And was it Mr. Dangerfield!" inquired Lowe, who was growing to admire that prompt, cynical hero more and more every hour.

"Be gannies it just was. He promised me five hundred guineas to make him speak. What all them solemn asses could not compass, that's sweepin' in their thousands every quarter, thanks to a discerning public. Baugh! He had heard of a rake-helly dog, with some stuff in his brain-pan, and he came to me—and I done it—Black Dillon done it—ha, ha! That's for the pack of them. Baugh!"

Sturk was propped up, and knew Lowe, and was, in a ghastly sort of way, glad to see him. He looked strangely pale and haggard, and spoke faintly.

"Take pen and ink," says he.

"He would not speak till you came," whispered Toole, who looked hotter than usual, and felt rather small, and was glad to edge in a word.

"An' don't let him talk too long; five minutes or so, and no more," said Doctor Dillon; "and give him another spoonful now—and where's Mr. Dangerfield?"

"And do you really mean to say, sir, he promised you a fee of five—eh?" said Toole, who could not restrain his somewhat angry curiosity.

"Five hundred guineas—ha, ha, ha!—be gannies, sir, there's a power of diversion in that."

"'Tis a munificent fee, and prompted by a fine public spirit. We are all his debtors for it; and to you, sir, too. He's an early man, sir, I'm told. You'll not see him to-night. But, whatever he has promised is already performed; you may rely on his honour."

"If you come out at nine in the morning, Dr. Dillon, you'll find him over his letters and desk, in his breakfast parlour," said Toole, who, apprehending that his night's work might possibly prove a hit for the disreputable and savage luminary, was treating him with more ceremony than he did at first.

"Short accounts, you know," said Dillon, locking the lid of his case down upon his instruments. "But maybe, as you say, 'tis best to see him in the morning—them rich fellows is often testy—ha! ha! An' a word with you, Dr. Toole," and he beckoned his brother aside to the corner near the door—and whispered something in his ear—and laughed a little awkwardly—and Toole, very red and grave, lent him—with many misgivings, two guineas.

"An' see—don't let them give him too much of that—the chicken broth's too sthrong—put some water to that, Miss, i' you plaze—and give him no more to-night—d'ye mind—than another half a wine-glass full of clart unless the Docthor here tells you."

So Dr. Dillon took leave, and his fiery steeds, whirling him onward, devoured, with their resounding hoofs, the road to Dublin.

"We had best have it in the shape of a deposition, sir, at once," said Lowe, adjusting himself at the writing-table by the bed-side, and taking the pen in his fingers.

"Tell it as shortly as you can, sir, but without haste," said Toole, with his finger on his pulse. Sturk looked dismal and frightened, like a man with a hangman at his elbow.

"It was that d——d villain—Charles Archer—write that down—'twas a foul blow, sir—I'm murdered—I suppose."

And then came a pause.

"Give me a spoonful of wine—I was coming out of town at dusk—this evening—"

"No, sir; you're here some time, stunned and unconscious."

"Eh!—how long?"

"No matter, sir, now. Just say the date of the night it happened."

Sturk uttered a deep groan.

"Am I dying?" said he.

"No, sir, please goodness—far from it," said Toole.

"Fracture?" asked Sturk, faintly.

"Why—yes—something of the sort—indeed—altogether a fracture; but going on mighty well, sir."

"Stabbed anywhere—or gunshot wound?" demanded Sturk.

"Nothing of the kind, sir, upon my honour."

"You think—I have a chance?" and Sturk's cadaverous face was moist with the dews of an awful suspense.

"Chance!" said Toole, in his encouraging tone, "well, I suppose you have, sir—ha! ha! But, you know, you must not tire yourself, and we hope to have you on your legs again, sir, in a reasonable time."

"Doctor, upon your honour, have I a chance?"

"You have, sir—certainly—yes—upon my honour."

"Thank God!" groaned Sturk, turning up the white of his eyes, and lifting up two very shaky hands.

"But you must not spoil it—and fatigue will do that for you," remarked Toole.

But, sir, sir—I beg pardon, Doctor Toole—but this case is not quite a common one. What Dr. Sturk is about to say may acquire an additional legal value by his understanding precisely the degree of danger in which he lies. Now, Doctor Sturk, you must not be over much disturbed," said Lowe.

"No, sir—don't fear me—I'm not much disturbed," said Sturk.

"Well, Doctor Toole," continued Lowe, "we must depart a little here from regular medical routine—tell Doctor Sturk plainly all you think."

"I don't like his pulse, sir. I think you had better not have agitated him," muttered Toole, with an impatient oath.

"'Tis worse to keep his mind doubtful, and on the stretch," said Lowe. "Doctor Toole, sir, has told you the bright side of the case. It is necessary, making the deposition you propose, that you should know t'other."

"Yes, of course—quite right—go on," said Sturk, faintly.

"Why, you know," said Toole, sniffing, and a little sulkily, "you know, Doctor Sturk, we Doctors like to put the best foot foremost; but you can't but be aware, that with the fractures—two fractures—along the summit of the skull, and the operation by the trepan, behind your head, just accomplished, there must be, of course, some danger."

"I see, sir," said Sturk, very quietly, but looking awfully cadaverous; "all I want to know is, how long do you think I may live?"

"You may recover altogether, sir—you may—but, of course—you may—there's a chance; and things might not go right," said Toole.

And as he spoke, Toole was dropping something from a phial into a wine-glass—sal volatile—ether—I can't say; but when Dr. Sturk swallowed it there was a "potter-carrier's" aroma about the room.

Then there was a pause for a while, and Toole kept his fingers on his pulse; and Sturk looked, for some time, as if he was on the point of fainting, which, in his case, might have proved very like dying.

"Have you the claret bottle in the room?" demanded Toole, a little flurried; for Sturk's pulses were playing odd pranks, and bounding and sinking in a dance of death.

"The what, sir?" asked the maid.

"The wine, woman—this instant," said the Doctor, imperiously.

So, the moment he had the bottle, he poured out half a large glass, and began spooning into Sturk's white parted lips.

Lowe looked on very uneasily; for he expected, as Toole did also, prodigious revelations; though each had a suspicion that he divined their nature tolerably clearly.

"Give him some more," said Toole, with his fingers on the sick man's wrist, and watching his countenance. "D— it, don't be afraid—more, some more—more!"

And so the Artillery Doctor's spirit revived within him; though with flickerings and tremblings; and he heaved some great sighs, and moved his lips. Then he lay still for a while; and after that he spoke.

"The pen, sir—write," he said. "He met me in the Butcher's Wood; he said he was going to sleep in town," and Sturk groaned dismally; "and he began talking on business—and turned and walked a bit with me. I did not expect to see him there—he was frank and spoke me fair. We were walking slowly. He looked up in the sky with his hands in his coat-pockets, and was a step or so in advance of me; and he turned short—I don't know—I had no more fear than you—and struck me a blow with something he had in his hand. He rose to the blow on his toes—'twas so swift, I had no time—I could not see what he struck with, 'twas like a short bit of rope."

"Charles Archer; do you know him, Dr. Toole?" asked Lowe.

Toole shook his head.

"Charles Archer!" he repeated, looking at Sturk; "where does he live?" and he winked to Toole, who was about speaking, to hold his peace.

"Here—in this town—Chapelized, up the river, a bit, with—with a—changed name," answered Sturk. And at the name he mentioned, Lowe and Toole, in silence and steadfastly, exchanged a pale, grim glance that was awful to see.

---

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

IN WHICH A CERTAIN SONGSTER TREATS THE COMPANY TO A DOLOUROUS BALLAD WHEREBY MR. IRONS IS SOMEWHAT MOVED.

It seemed that Mr. Dangerfield had taken Zekiel Irons' measure pretty exactly. The clerk had quite made up his mind to take the bold step urged upon him by that gentlemen.

He walked down to the village from the little gate of the Brass Castle, where he had talked with Mr. Dangerfield, appointing eight o'clock next morning for making the deposition; late now for all purposes but to nail him to a line of viva voce evidence when he should come to be examined on Charles Nutter's approaching trial. The whole way along he walked with the piece of silver, which Mr. Paul Dangerfield had given him, griped tight in his crooked fingers, in his breeches' pocket—no change in his grim and sinister face—no turn of the head—no side glance of the eye—all dark, rigid, and tense.

The mechanism of long habit brought him round the corner to the door of the Salmon House, the "public" facing, but with the length of the street interposing, the Phoenix, whose lights were visible through and under the branches of the village tree. His mind wandered back to the Mills with a shock, and glided stealthily past the Brass Castle without dwelling there; and he looked down the street. Over the bridge, at the Elms, lay death in its awful purity. At his left, in the Gray Stone House, was Doctor Sturk—the witness with sealed lips—the victim of Charles Archer's mysterious prowess; and behind lay the church-yard, and the quiet little church with that vault and nameless coffin. Altogether, the suggestions and associations about him were not cheerful or comfortable.

"I'm like a man surrounded. I wish I was out of it all;" he muttered, with a careworn glance.

So he entered the public-house.

There was not much business doing. Three friends, Smithfield dealers, or some such folk, talking loudly over their liquor; of prices and prospects; and one fat fellow, by the fire, smoking a pipe, with a large glass of punch at his elbow.

"Ah, then, Mr. Irons, an' is it yourself that's in it; and where in the world wor ye all this time?" said the landlady.

"Business, ma'am—business, Mrs. Molloy."

"An' there's your chair waitin' for you beside the fire, Mr. Irons, this month an' more—a cowl'd evening—and we all wondherin' what in the wide world was gone widg ye—this I do'no how long."

"Thank ye, ma'am—a pipe and a glass o' punch."

Irons was always a man of few words, and his laconics did not strike Mistress Molloy as anything very strange. So she wiped the little table at his side, and with one foot on the fender, and his elbow on his knee, he smoked leisurely into the fire-place.

The three gentlemen at the table called for more liquor, and the stout personage, sitting opposite to Irons, dropped into their talk, having smoked out his pipe, and their conversation became more general and hilarious; but Irons scarce heard it. Curiosity is an idle minx, and a soul laden like the clerk's has no entertainment for her. But when one of the three gentlemen who sat together—an honest but sad-looking person with a flaxen wig, and a fat, florid face—placing his hand in the breast of his red plush waist-coat, and throwing himself back in his chair, struck up a dismal tune, with a certain character of psalmody in it, the clerk's ear was charmed for a moment, and he glanced on the singer, and sipped some punch; and the ballad, rude and almost rhymeless, which he chanted had an undefined and unpleasant fascination for Irons. It was thus:—

"A man there was near Ballymooney,
Was guilty of a deed o' blood,
For thraveling' alongside iv ould Tim Rooney,
He kilt him in a lonesome wood.

"He took his purse, and his hat, and cravat,
And stole his buckles and his prayer-book, too;
And neck-and-heels, like a cruel savage,
His corpus through the wood he drew.

"He pult him over to a big bog-hole,
And sunk him undher four-foot o' wather,
And built him down wid many a thumpin' stone,
And slipt the bank out on the corpus afther."

Here the singer made a little pause, and took a great pull at the beer-can, and Irons looked over his shoulder at the minstrel; but his uneasy and malignant glance encountered only the bottom of the vessel; and so he listened for more which soon came thus:—

"An' says he, Tim Rooney you're there my boy,
Kep' down in the bog-hole wid the force iv suction,
An' 'tisen't myself you'll throuble or annoy,
To the best o' my opinion, to the resurrection.

"With that, on he walks to the town o' Drumgoole,
And sot by the fire in an inn was there;
And sittin' beside him, says the ghost—"You fool!
'Tis myself beside ye, Shamus, everywhere."

"Is there much more o' that?" demanded Irons, rather savagely.

The thirsty gentleman in the red plush waist-coat was once more, as he termed it, "wetting his whistle;" but one of his comrades responded tartly enough—

"I'd like there was—an' if you mislike it, neighbour, there's the door."

If he expected a quarrel, however, it did not come; and he saw by Irons' wandering eye, fierce as it looked, that his thoughts for the moment were elsewhere. And just then the songster having wiped his mouth in his coat-sleeve, started afresh in these terms—

"You'll walk the world with a dreadful knowledge,
And a heavy heart and a frowning brow;
And thinking deeper than a man in college,
Your eye will deaden, and your back will bow.

"And when the period iv your life is over,
The frightful hour of judgment then will be;
And, Shamus Hanlon, heavy on your shoulder,
I'll lay my cowl'd hand, and you'll go wid me."

This awful ditty died away in the prolonged drone which still finds favour in the ears of our Irish rustic musicians, and the company now began to talk of congenial themes, murders, ghosts, and retributions, and the horrid tune went dismally booming on in Mr. Irons' ear.

Trifling, and apparently wholly accidental, as was this occurrence, the musical and moral treat had a very permanent effect upon the fortunes of Irons and those of other persons who figure in our story. Mr. Irons had another and another glass of punch. They made him only more malign and saturnine. He sat in his corner by the fire, silent and dismal; and no one cared what was passing in the brain behind that black and scowling mask. He paid sternly and furiously, like a villain who has lost at play; and without a "good night," or any other leave-taking, glided ominously from the room; and the gentlemen who carried on the discourse and convivialities of the Salmon House, followed him with a jibe or two, and felt the pleasanter for the removal of that ungracious presence.

A few minutes later, Mr. Lowe stood on the hall-door step, and, calling to his man, gave him a little note and some silver, and a message—very impressively repeated—and the groom touched his hat, and buttoned up his coat about his neck, the wind being from the east, and he started, at something very near a gallop, for Dublin.

There was a man at the door of the Salmon House, who, with a taciturn and saturnine excitement, watched the unusual bustle going on at the door-steps of Doctor Sturk's dwelling. This individual had been drinking there for a while; and having paid his shot, stood with his back to the wall, and his hands in his pockets.

After Lowe went into the house again, seeing the maid still upon the steps, talking with Mr. Moore, the barber, who was making his lingering adieux there, this person drew near, and just as the tonsor made his final farewell, he presented himself in time to arrest the retreat of the damsel.

"By your leave, Mistress Katty," said he, laying his hand on the iron rail of the door-steps.

"Oh, good jewel! an' is that yourself, Mr. Irons! And where in the world wor you this month an' more?"

"Business—nothin'—in Mullingar—an' how's the Docthor to-night?"

"He's elegant, my dear—beyant the beyants—why, he's sittin' up, dhrinking chicken-broth, and talking law-business with Mr. Lowe."

"He's talkin'!"

"Ay is he, and Mr. Lowe just this minute writ down all about the way he come by the breakin' of his skull in the Park, and we'll have great doings on the head of it; for the master swore to it, and Doctor Toole"—

"An' who done it?" demanded Irons, ascending a step, and grasping the iron rail.

"I couldn't hear—nor no one, only themselves."

"An' who's that rode down the Dublin road this minute?"

"That's Mr. Lowe's man; 'tis what he's sent him to Dublin wid a note."

"I see," said Irons; and he came up another step, and held the iron rail and shook it, like a man grasping a battle-axe, and stared straight at her, with a look so strange, and a visage so black, that she was half-frightened.

"A what's the matther wid you, Misther Irons?" she demanded.

But he stared on in silence, scowling through her face at vacancy, and swaying slightly as he griped the metal banister.

"I will," he muttered, and he took Katty by the hand, and shook it slowly in his own cold, damp grasp as he asked, with the same intense and forbidding look,

"Is Mr. Lowe in the house still?"

"He is, himself and Docthor Toole, in the back parlour." •

"Whisper him, Katty, this minute, there's a man has a thing to tell him."

"What about?" inquires Katty.

"About a great malefactor."

Katty paused, with her mouth open, expecting more.

"Tell him now; at once, woman; you don't know what delay may cost."

He spoke impetuously, and with a bitter sort of emphasis, like a man in a hurry to commit himself to a course, distrusting his own resolution.

She was frightened at his sudden fierceness, and drew back into the hall and he with her, and he shut the door with a clang behind him, and then looked before him, stunned and wild, like a man called up from his bed into danger.

The woman knocked at the parlour door, and Lowe opened it.

"Who's here?" he asked, looking at Irons, whose face he remembered, though he forgot to whom it belonged.

"I'm Zekiel Irons, the parish clerk, please your worship, and all I want is ten minutes alone with your honour."

"For what purpose?" demanded the magistrate, eyeing him sharply.

"To tell you all about a damned murder."

"Hey—why—who did it?"

"Charles Archer," he answered; and screwed up his mouth with a convulsive grimace, glaring bloodlessly at the Justice.

"Ha! Charles Archer! I think we know something already about that."

"I don't think you do, though; and by your leave, you'll promise, if I bring it home to him, you'll see me safe through it. 'Tis what I'm the only witness living that knows all about it."

"Well, what is it about?"

"The murder of Mr. Beauclerc, that my Lord of Dunoran was tried and found guilty for."

"Why, all very good; but that did not happen in Ireland."

"No. At Newmarket, the Pied Horse."

"Ay, in England. I know; and that's out of our jurisdiction."

"I don't care. I'll go to London if you like—to Bow-street—anywhere—so as I make sure to hang him; for my life is worse than death while he's at this side of the grave—and I'd rather be in my coffin—I would—than live within five miles of him. Anyway, you'll hear what I have to say, and to swear, and send me safe across the water to Bow-street, or wherever else you think best; for, if he has his liberty, and gets sight o' me again, I'm a dead man."

"Come in here, Mr. Irons, and take a chair," said the Justice.

Doctor Toole was in the room, in a balloon-backed chair, regaling himself with a long pipe, and Mr. Lowe shut the door.

"We have another deposition, Doctor, to take; Mr. Irons, here, is prepared to swear informations of very singular importance."

"Irons, hollo! from what planet did you drop to-night?"

"Mullingar, sir."

"Nothing about the burning of the old woman at Tyrrell's Pass, eh?"

"No—'tis an old story. I don't care what comes of it, I'm innocent, only you'll say I kept it too long to myself. But you can't touch my life. I'm more afraid of him than you, and, with good cause; but I think he's in a corner now, an' I'll speak out and take my chance, and you mustn't allow me to be murdered."

By this time Lowe had procured writing materials, and all being ready, he and the curious and astonished Doctor heard a story very like what we have already heard from the same lips.

---

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

MR. PAUL DANGERFIELD HAS SOMETHING ON HIS MIND, AND CAPTAIN DEVEREUX RECEIVES A MESSAGE.

MR. DANGERFIELD having parted with Irons, entered the little garden, or shrubbery, which skirted on either side the short gravel walk, which expanded to a miniature court-yard before the door of the Brass Castle. He flung the little iron gate to with a bitter clang; so violent that the latch sprang from its hold, and the screaming iron swung quivering open again behind him.

Like other men who have little religion, Mr. Paul Dangerfield had a sort of vague superstition. He was impressible by omens, though he scorned his own weakness, and sneered at, and quizzed it sometimes in the monologues of his ugly solitude. The swinging open of the outer gate of his castle sounded uncomfortably behind him, like an invitation to shapeless danger to step in after him. The further he left it behind him, the more in his spirit was the gaping void between his two little piers associated with the idea of exposure, defencelessness, and rashness. This feeling grew so strong, that he turned about before he reached his hall-door, and with a sensation akin to fury, retraced the fifteen or twenty steps that intervened, and grasped the cold iron with the fiercest tension of his sinews, as if it had resented his first violence by a dogged defiance of his wishes, and spluttering a curse between his teeth, he dashed it to again—and again, as once more it sprang open from the shock.

“Who’s master now?” snarled Mr. Paul Dangerfield, through his clenched teeth, and smiting the senseless iron with a vindictive swoop of his cane. I fancy his face at this moment had some of the peculiar lines and corrugations which we observe in that of Retzsch’s Mephistophiles, when he grips the arm of Faust to drag him from Margaret’s cell.

Black Dillon’s failure was a blow to the progress of his plans. It incensed him. That d——d' outcast! That he should presume so to treat a man who could master him so easily at any game, and buy and sell him body and soul, and had actually bargained to give him five hundred guineas—the needy, swinish miscreant! and paid him earnest beside—the stupid cheat! Drink—dice—women! Why, five hundred guineas made him free of his filthy paradise for a twelvemonth, and the oaf could not quit his impurities for an hour, and keep the appointment that was to have made him master of his heart's desires.”

At his hall-door he paused, listening intently, with his spectacles glimmering toward Chapelized, for the sound of a distant step; but there was no messenger afoot. He heard only the chill sigh of the air through the leafless branches.

Mr. Dangerfield had not his key with him; and he beat an unnecessarily loud and long tattoo upon his door, and, before it could possibly have been answered, he thundered a second through the passages.

Mrs. Jukes knew the meaning of that harsh and rabid summons. “There was something on the master's mind.” His anxieties never depressed him as they did other men, but strung up his energies to a point of mental tension and exasperation which made him terrible to his domestics. It was not his acts—his conduct was always under control, but chiefly his looks, and accents, and an influence that seemed to take possession of him at such times that rendered him undefinably formidable to his servants.

“Ha!—mighty obleeing (he so pronounced the word)—let in at last—cold outside, ma'am. You've let out the fire I suppose?”

His tones were like the bark of a wolf, and there was a devilish smirk in his white face, as he made her a mock salutation, and glided into his parlour. The fire was bright enough, however, as Mrs. Jukes was much relieved to see; and dropping a courtesy, she inquired whether he would like a dish of tea, or anything?

"No, ma'am!" he snarled.

Would he like his dressing-gown and slippers?

"No, ma'am," again. So she dropped another courtesy, and sneaked away to the kitchen, with short, noiseless steps, and heard Mr. Dangerfield shut the door sharply.

He poked up his fire and lighted his candles. Somehow, the room looked smaller he thought than it had ever seemed before. He was not nervous—nothing could bring him to that; but his little altercation with the iron gate, and some uncomfortable thoughts had excited him. It was an illusion merely—but the walls seemed to have closed in a foot or two, and the ceiling to have dropped down proportionably, and he felt himself confined and oppressed.

"My head's a little bit heated—ira furor brevis," and he sneered a solitary laugh, more like himself, and went out into his tiny hall, and opened the door, and stood on the step for air, enjoying the cold wind that played about his temples. Presently he heard the hollow clink of two pair of feet walking towards the village. The pedestrians were talking eagerly; and he thought, as they passed the little iron gate of his domain, he heard his own name mentioned, and then that of Mervyn. I dare say it was mere fancy; but somehow, he did not like it, and he walked swiftly down to the little gate by the road side, keeping upon the grass that bounded it, to muffle the sound of his steps. The interlocutors had got a good way on, and were talking loud and volubly. But he heard nothing that concerned him from either again, though he waited until their steps and voices were lost in the distance.

The cool air was pleasant about his bare temples, and Mr. Paul Dangerfield waited a while longer, and listened for any sound of footsteps approaching from the village, but none such was audible; and beginning to feel a little chilly, he entered his domicile again, shut the hall-door, and once more found himself in the little parlour of the Brass Castle.

"There's something to vex, but nothing to threaten—nothing.

It's all that comical dream—curse it! What tricks the brain plays us! 'Tis fair it should though. We work it while we please, and it plays when it may. The slave has his saturnalia, and flouts his tyrant. Ha, ha! 'tis time these follies were ended. I've something to do to-night."

So Mr. Dangerfield became himself again, and applied himself keenly to his business.

Puddock and Devereux on this eventful night, as we remember, having shaken hands at the door-steps, turned and went up-stairs together, very amicably again, to the Captain's drawing-room.

So Devereux, when they returned to his lodgings, had lost much of his reserve, and once on the theme of his grief, stormed on in gusts, and lulls, and thunder, and wild upbraidings, and sudden calms; and the good-natured soul of little Puddock was touched; and though he did not speak, he often dried his eyes quietly.

"There's no one stirring now, Puddock—I'll put my cloak about me, and walk over to the Elms, to ask how the Rector is to-night," said Devereux, muffling himself in his military mantle.

It was only the restlessness of grief. Like all other pain, grief is haunted with the illusion that change means relief; motion is the instinct of escape. Puddock walked beside him, and they went swiftly and silently together.

When they reached the other side of the bridge, and stood under the thorn-hedge fronting the leafless elms, Devereux was irresolute.

"Would you wish me to inquire?" asked Puddock. Devereux held him doubtfully by the arm for a moment or two, and then said gently—

"No, I thank you, Puddock—I'll go—yes—I'll go myself;" and so Captain Devereux went up to the door.

John Tracy, at the steps, told him that he thought his master wished to speak with him; but he was not quite sure. The tall muffled figure therefore waited at the door while John went in to tell his master, and soon returned to say that Doctor Walsingham would be much obliged to him to step into the study.

When the Doctor saw Devereux he stood up to meet him.

"I hope, sir," said Devereux, very humbly, "you have forgiven me."

The Doctor took his hand and shook it very hard, and said, "there's nothing—we're both in sorrow. Everyone—everyone is sorry, sir, but you more."

Devereux did not say anything, being moved, as I suppose. But he had drawn his cloak about his face, and was looking down.

"There was a little message—only a word or two," said the Doctor; "but everything of her's is sacred."

He turned over some papers in his desk, and chose one. It was in Lilly's pretty handwriting.

"I am charged with this little message. Oh, my darling!" and the old man cried bitterly.

"Pray, read it—you will understand it—'tis easily read. What a pretty hand it was!"

So Devereux took the little paper, and read just the words which follow :—

"My beloved father will, I hope, if he thinks it right, tell Captain Richard Devereux that I was not so unkind and thankless as I may have seemed, but very grateful for his preference, of which I know, in many ways, how unworthy I was. But I do not think we could have been happy; and being all over, it is a great comfort to friends who are separated here, that there is a place where all may meet again, if God will; and as I did not see or speak with him since my dear father brought his message, I wished that so much should be said, and also to say a kind good-bye, and give him all good wishes.

"LILLIAS.

"Friday evening."

Captain Devereux read this simple little record through, and then he said—

“Oh, sir, may I have it—isn't it mine?”

We who have heard those wonderful aerial echoes of Killarney when the breath has left the bugle and its cadences are silent, take up the broken links of the lost melody with an answer far away, sad and celestial, real, yet unreal, have something in memory by which we can illustrate the effect of these true voices of the thoughts and affections that have perished, returning for a few charmed moments from the sea of eternal silence.

And so that sad and clear farewell, never repeated, was long after, in many a lonely night, answered by the voice of Devereux.

“Did she—did she know how I loved her? Oh, never, never! I'll never love any but you. Darling, darling—you can't die. Oh, no, no, no! Your place knows you still; your place is here—here—here.”

And he smote his breast over that heart which, such as it was, cherished a pure affection for her.

---

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

THE WHER-WOLF.

ON the morning of the day whose events I have been describing in the last half dozen chapters, Mr. Paul Dangerfield was packing two trunks in his little parlour, and burning letters industriously in the fire, when his keen ear caught a sound at which a prophetic instinct within him vibrated alarm. A minute or two before he had heard a stealthy footstep outside. Then he heard the cook walk along the passage, muttering to herself, to the hall-door, when there was a whispering. He glanced round his shoulder at the window. It was barred. Then lifting the little table and its load lightly from before him, he stood erect, fronting the door, and listened intently. Two steps on tip-toe brought him to it, and he placed his fingers on the key. But he recollected a better way. There was one of those bolts that rise and fall perpendicularly in a series of rings, and bar or open the door by a touch to a rope connected with it by a wire and a crank or two.

He let the bolt softly drop into its place; the rope was within easy reach, and with his spectacles gleaming white on the door he kept humming a desultory tune, like a man over some listless occupation.

Mr. Paul Dangerfield was listening intently, and stept as softly as a cat. Then, with a motion almost elegant, he dropt his right hand lightly into his coat-pocket, where it lay still in ambushade.

There came a puffing night air along the passage, and rattled the door; then a quiet shutting of the hall-door, and a shuffling and breathing near the parlour.

Dangerfield humming his idle tune with a white and sharpening face, and a gaze that never swerved, extended his delicately-shaped fingers to the rope, and held it in his left hand. At this moment, the door-handle was suddenly turned outside, and the door sustained a violent jerk.

"Who's there?" demanded the harsh, prompt accents of Dangerfield, suspending his minstrelsy—"I'm busy."

"Open the door—we've a piece of intelligence to gie ye."

"Certainly—but don't be tedious." (He drew the string, and the bolt shot up.) "Come in, sir."

The door flew open; several strange faces presented themselves on the threshold, and at the same instant, a stern voice exclaimed—

"Charles Archer, I arrest you in the King's name."

The last word was lost in the stunning report of a pistol, and the foremost man fell with a groan. A second pistol already glanced in Dangerfield's hand, and missed. With a spring like a tiger, he struck the hesitating constable in the throat, laying his scalp open against the door-frame, and stamping on his face as he fell; and clutching the third by the cravat, he struck at his breast with a knife already in his hand. But a pistol-shot from Lowe struck his right arm, scorching the cloth; the dagger and the limb dropt, and he staggered back, but recovered his equilibrium, and confronted them with a white skull-like grin, and a low "ha, ha, ha!"

It was all over, and the silver spectacles lay shattered on the floor, and a pair of gray, strangely-set, wild eyes glared upon them.

"Heinous old villain!" said Lowe, advancing on him.

"Well, gentlemen, I've shown fight, eh?—and now I suppose you want my watch, and money, and keys,—eh?"

"Read the warrant, sir," said Lowe, sternly.

"Warrant! hey—warrant?—why, this is something new—will you be so good as to give me a glass of water—thank you—hold the paper a moment longer—I can't get this arm up." With his left hand he set down the tumbler-glass, and then held up the warrant.

"Thank ye. Well, this warrant's for Charles Archer."

"Alias Paul Dangerfield—if you read, sir."

"Thank you—yes—I see—that's news to me. Oh! Mr. Lowe—I did not see you—I haven't hurt you, I hope? Why the plague do you come at these robbing hours? We'd have all fared better had you come by daylight."

Lowe did not take the trouble to answer him.

"I believe you've killed that constable in the exercise of his duty, sir; the man's dead;" said Lowe, sternly.

"Well, gentlemen, you have made a false arrest, and shot me while defending my person—you—four to one!—and caused the death of your accomplice; what more do you want?"

"You must accompany us to the county gaol, sir; where I'll hand in your committal."

"Dr. Toole, I presume, may dress my arm?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Good! what more?"

"There's a coach at the door, you'll please to step in, sir!"

"Good, sir, again; and now permit me to make a remark. I subjoin, sir, to all this violence, and will go forth with you, under protest, and with a distinct warning to you, Mr. Lowe, and to your respectable body-guard of prize-fighters and ruffians—how many?—two, four, five, six, upon my honour, counting the gentleman upon the floor, and yourself, sir—seven, pitted against one old fellow, ha, ha, ha!—a distinct warning, sir, that I hold you accountable for this outrage, and all its consequences."

"See to that man; I'm afraid he has killed him," said Lowe.

He was not dead, however, but, as it seemed, suffering intense pain, and unable to speak, except in a whisper. They got him up with his back to the wall.

"You issue a warrant against another man whom I believe to be dead, and execute it upon me—rather an Irish proceeding, sir; but, perhaps, if not considered impertinent, you will permit me to inquire what is the particular offence which that other person has committed, and for which you have been pleased to shoot me?"

"You may read it on the warrant, sir; 'tis for a murderous assault on Dr. Sturk."

"Hey! better and better! why, I'm ready to pay five hundred guineas to make him speak; and you'll soon find how expensive a blunder you've committed, sir," observed Dangerfield, with a glare of menace through his hollow smile.

"I'll stand that hazard, sir," rejoined Lowe with a confident sneer.

The dreadful sounds of the brief scuffle had called up the scared and curious servants. The smell of the pistol-smoke, the sight of blood, the pale faces of the angry and agitated men, and the spectacle of their master, mangled, ghastly, and smiling, afrighted Mrs. Jukes ; and the shock and horror expressed themselves in tears and distracted lamentations.

"I must have your keys, sir, if you please," said Mr. Lowe.

"A word first—here, Jukes," he addressed his housekeeper ; "stop that, you fool !" (she was blubbering loudly,) "'tis a mistake, I tell you ; I shall be back in an hour. Meanwhile, here are my keys ; let Mr. Lowe, there, have them whenever he likes—all my papers, sir, (turning to Lowe). I've nothing, thank heaven ! to conceal. Pour some port wine into that large glass."

And he drank it off, and looked better ; he appeared before on the point of fainting.

"I beg pardon, gentlemen—will you drink some wine ?"

"I thank you, no, sir. You'll be good enough to give me those keys," (to the housekeeper).

"Give them—certainly," said Dangerfield.

"Which of them opens the chest of drawers in your master's bed-chamber facing the window ?" He glanced at Dangerfield, and thought that he was smiling wider, and his jaws looked hollower, as he repeated—

"If she does not know it, I'll be happy to show it to you."

With a surly nod, Mr. Lowe requited the prisoner's urbanity, and followed Mrs. Jukes into her master's bed-chamber ; there was an old-fashioned oak chest of drawers facing the window.

"Where's Captain Cluffe," enquired Lowe.

"He stopped at his lodgings, on the way," answered the man ; "and said he'd be after us in five minutes."

"Well, be good enough, madam, to show me the key of these drawers."

So he opened the drawers in succession, beginning at the top, and searching each carefully, running his fingers along the inner edges, and holding the candle very close, and grunting his disappointment as he closed and locked each in its order.

In the mean time, Doctor Toole was ushered into the little parlour, where sat the disabled master of the Brass Castle. The fussy little mediciner showed in his pale, stern countenance, a sense of the shocking reverse and transformation which the great man of the village had sustained.

"A rather odd situation you find me in, Doctor Toole," said white Mr. Dangerfield, in his usual harsh tones, but with a cold moisture shining on his face.

Toole proceeded to his task much more silently than was his wont, and stealing, from time to time, a glance at his noticeable patient with the wild gray eyes, as people peep curiously at what is terrible and repulsive.

"'Tis broken, of course?" said Dangerfield.

"Why, yes, sir," answered Toole; "the upper arm—a bullet, sir. H'm, ha—yes; it lies only under the skin, sir."

And with a touch of the sharp steel it dropped into the doctor's fingers, and lay on a bloody bit of lint on the table by the wine-glasses. Toole applied his sticking-plaster, and extemporised a set of splints, and had the terrified cook at his elbow tearing up one of her master's shirts into strips for bandages; and so went on neatly and rapidly with his shifty task.

In the mean time, Cluffe had arrived. He was a little bit huffed and grand at being nailed as an evidence, upon a few words carelessly, or, if you will, confidentially dropped at his own mess-table, where Lowe chanced to be a guest; and certainly with no suspicion that his little story could in any way be made to elucidate the mystery of Sturk's murder.

"Yes, the drawers were there, he supposed; those were the very ones, he stooped but little; it must have been the top one, or the next to it. The thing was about as long as a drumstick, like a piece of whip handle, with a spring in it; it bent this way and that, as he dried it in the towel, and at the butt it was ribbed round and round with metal rings—devilish heavy."

So they examined the drawers again, took everything out of them, and Captain Cluffe, not thinking it a soldier-like occupation, tacitly declined being present at it, and, turning on his heel, stalked out of the room.

"What's become of it, ma'am?" said Lowe, suddenly and sternly, turning upon Mrs. Jukes, and fixing his eyes on hers. There was no guilty knowledge there.

"He never had any such thing, that I know of," she answered, stoutly; "and nothing could be hid from me in these drawers, sir; for I had the key, except when it lay in the lock, and it must have been his horsewhip; it has some rings like of leather round it, and he used to lay it on these drawers."

"And where's that whip, now?" demanded Lowe.

"By the hall-door, with his riding-coat, sir," answered the bewildered housekeeper.

"Go on, if you please ma'am, and let me see it."

So to the hall they went, and there, lying across the pegs from which Mr. Dangerfield's surtout and riding-coat depended, there certainly was a whip with the butt fashioned very much in the shape described by Captain Cluffe; but alas, no weapon—a mere toy—leather and cat-gut.

Lowe took it in his hand, and weighing it with a look of disgust and disappointment, asked rather impatiently—

"Where's Captain Cluffe?"

The Captain had gone away.

"Very well, I see," said Lowe, replacing the whip; "that will do. The hound!"

Mr. Lowe now re-entered the little parlour, where the incongruous crowd, lighted up with Mr. Dangerfield's wax-lights and several kitchen candles flaring in greasy-brass sticks, were assisting at the treatment of the master of the castle and the wounded constables.

"Well, sir," said Mr. Dangerfield, standing erect, with his coat-sleeve slit, and his arm braced up in splints, stiff and helpless in a sling, and a blot of blood in his shirt-sleeve, contrasting with the white intense smirk of menace upon his face; "if you have quite done with my linen and my housekeeper, sir, I'm ready to accompany you. I charge you, sir, with the safety of my papers and my other property which you constrain me to abandon in this house ; and I'll think you'll rue this night's work to the latest hour of your existence."

"The coach is at the door, hey !" asked Lowe.

"I say, sir," continued Dangerfield, with a wolfish glare, and speaking in something like a suppressed shriek; "you shall hear my warning and my protest, although it should occupy the unreasonable period of two whole minutes of your precious time. You half murder, and then arrest me for the offence of another man, and under the name of a man who has been dead and buried full twenty years. And in your stupid arrogance you dare to libel me with his villanous name, and the imputation of his crimes—to violate my house at the dead of night—to pistol me upon my own floor—and to carry me off by force, as you purpose, to a common gaol. Kill Dr. Stark indeed ! Are you mad, sir ? I who offered a fee of five hundred guineas even to bring him to speech. But even without Stark's speaking one word, I've evidence which escaped you, conceited blockhead, and which, though the witness is as mad almost as yourself, will yet be enough to direct the hand of justice to the right man. There is a Charles, sir, whom all suspect, who awaits trial, judgment, and death in this case, the wretched Charles Nutter of the Mills, sir, whose motive is patent, and on whose proceedings a light will, I believe, be thrown by the evidence of Zekiel Irons, whatever that evidence may be worth."

"I don't care to tell you, sir, that 'tis partly on the evidence of that same Zekiel Irons that I've arrested you," said Mr. Justice Lowe.

"Zekiel Irons, me ! What—Zekiel Irons charge me with the crime which he was here, not two hours since, fastening on oath upon Charles Nutter ! Why, sir, he asked me to bring him to your residence in the morning, that he might swear to the information which he repeated in my presence, and of which there's a note in that desk. 'Pon my life, sir, tis an agreeable society, this ; the mad directing the mad, and both falling foul of the same. One word from Doctor Sturk, sir, will blast you, so soon as, please heaven, he shall speak."

"He has spoken, sir," replied Lowe, whose angry passions were roused by the insults of Dangerfield, and who had, for the moment, lost his customary caution.

"Ha!" cried Dangerfield, with a sort of gasp, and a violent smirk, the joyousness of which was, however, counteracted by a lurid scowl, and a wonderful livid glare in his wild eyes; "ha! he has? Well, sir; and notwithstanding his declaration, you arrest me upon the monstrous assertion of a crazy clerk, you consummate blockhead!"

"Sir, I never made it a practice yet to hide evidence from a prisoner. Why should I desire to put you out of the world, if you're innocent? Doctor Sturk, sir, has denounced you distinctly upon oath. Charles Archer, going by the name of Paul Dangerfield, and residing in this house, called the 'Brass Castle,' as the person who attempted to murder him in the Butcher's Wood."

"What, sir?—Doctor Sturk denounce me! Fore heaven, sir—it seems to me you've all lost your wits. Doctor Sturk!—Doctor Sturk charge me with having assaulted him! why—curse it, sir—it can't possibly be—you can't believe it; and, if he said it, the man's raving still."

"He has said it, sir."

"Then, sir, in the devil's name, didn't it strike you as going rather fast to shoot me on my hearthstone—me, knowing all you do about me—with no better warrant than the talk of a man with a shattered brain, awakening from a lethargy of months? Sir, though the laws afford no punishment exemplary enough for such atrocious precipitation, I promise you I'll exact the last penalty they provide; and now, sir, take me where you will; I can't resist.

So saying, Dangerfield, with his left hand, clapt his cocked hat on, and with a ghastly smile nodded a farewell to Mrs. Jukes. The hall-door stood open; the candles flared in the night air, and with the jaunty, resolute step of a man marching to victory and revenge, he walked out, and lightly mounted to his place. At the crack of the whip and the driver's voice, the horses scrambled into motion, the wheels revolved, and the master of the Brass Castle, and the equipage, glided away.

---

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

IN WHICH DOCTOR TOOLE AND DIRTY DAVY CONFER IN THE BLUE-ROOM.

THE coach rumbled along toward Dublin at a leisurely jog. Notwithstanding the firm front Mr. Lowe had presented, Dangerfield's harangue had affected him unpleasantly. Cluffe's little bit of information respecting the instrument he had seen the prisoner lay up in his drawer on the night of the murder, and which corresponded in description with the wounds traced upon Sturk's skull, seemed to have failed. The handle of Dangerfield's harmless horse-whip, his mind misgave him, was all that would come of that piece of evidence; and it was impossible to say there might not be something in all that Dangerfield had uttered. But, with Dangerfield's presence, the effect of his plausibilities and his defence passed away. The pointed and consistent evidence of Sturk, and the corroborative testimony of Irons, equally distinct and damning—the whole case for a moment grown hazy and uncertain in the presence of that white sorcerer, re-adjusted itself now that he was gone, and came out in iron and compact relief—impregnable.

Next morning, you may be sure, the news was all over the town of Chapelizod. All sorts of cross rumours and wild canards, of course, were on the wind, and every new fact or fib borne to the door-step with the fresh eggs, or the morning's milk and butter, was carried by the eager servant into the parlour, and swallowed down their toast and tea by the staling company.

Upon one point all were agreed: Mr. Paul Dangerfield lay in the county gaol, on the charge of having assaulted Dr. Sturk with intent to kill him. The women blessed themselves, and turned pale. The men looked queer when they met one another. It was altogether so astounding—Mr. Dangerfield was so rich—so eminent—so moral—so charitable—so above temptation. It had come out that he had committed, some said three, others as many as fifteen secret murders.

For Mary Matchwell, at the Mills, the tidings which had thrown the town into commotion had but a solitary and selfish interest. She was glad that Nutter was exculpated. She had no desire that the king should take his worldly goods to which she intended helping herself: otherwise he might hang or drown for aught she cared. Dirty Davy, too, who had quaked about his costs, was greatly relieved by the turn which things had taken; and the plain truth was that, notwithstanding his escape from the halter, things looked very black and awful for Charles Nutter and his poor little wife, Sally.

Dr. Toole, at half-past nine, was entertaining two or three of the neighbours, chiefly in oracular whispers, by the fire in the great parlor of the Phoenix, when he was interrupted by Larry, the waiter, with—

“Your horse is at the door, Dochter,” (Toole was going into town, but was first to keep an appointment at Dr. Sturk’s with Mr. Lowe), “and” continued Larry, “there’s a fat gentleman in the blue-room wants to see you, if you plaze.”

“Hey!—ho! let’s see thep,” said little Toole, bustling forth with an important air. “The blue room, hey?”

When he opened the door of that small apartment there stood a stout, corpulent, rather seedy and dusty personage, at the window, looking out and whistling, with his hat on. He turned lazily about as Toole entered, and displayed the fat and forbidden face of Dirty Davy.

"Oh! I thought it might be professionally, sir," said Toole, a little grandly; for he had seen the gentleman before, and had, by this time, found out all about him, and perceived he had no chance of a fee.

"It is professionally, sir," quoth Dirty Davy, "if you'll be so obleegeing as to give me five minutes."

So Toole declared himself ready and prepared to do his office, and Dirty Davy commenced.

"I'm on my way, sir, to the Mills, where my client, Mrs. Nutter, resides; and I called at your house, Doctor, and they sent me here; and I am desirous to prove to you, sir, as a friend of Miss Sarah Harty, styling herself Mrs. Nutter, that my client's rights are clear and irresistible, in order that you may use any interest you may have with that ill-advised faymale to induce her to submit without further annoyance; and I tell you, in confidence, she has run herself already, into a very sarious predicament."

"Well, sir, I'll be happy to hear you," answered Toole.

"Tis no more, sir, than I expected from your well-known candour," replied Dirty Davy, with the unctuous politeness with which he treated such gentlemen as he expected to make use of. "Now, sir, I'll open our case without any reserve or exaggeration to you, sir, and that, Dr. Toole, is what I would not do to many beside yourself. The facts is in a nutshell. We claim our conjugal rights. Why, sir? Because, sir, we married the oppugnant, Charles Nutter, gentleman, of the Mills, and soforth, on the 7th of April, Anno Domini, 1750, in the church of St. Clement Danes, in London, of which marriage this, sir, is a verbatim copy of the certificate. Now, sir, your client—I mane your friend—Misthress Mary Harty, who at present affects the state and usurps the rights of marriage against my client, the rightful Mrs. Nutter, performed and celebrated a certain pretended marriage with the same Charles Nutter, in Chapelizod Church, on the 4th of June, 1758, seven years and ten months, wanting three days, subsequent to the marriage of my client. Well, sir, I see exactly, sir, what you'd ask : 'Is the certificate genuine?'"

Toole grunted an assent.

"Well, sir, upon that point I have to show you this," and he handed him a copy of Mr. Luke Gamble's notice served only two days before, to the effect that, having satisfied himself by inquiring on the spot, of the authenticity of the certificate of the marriage of Charles Nutter of the Mills, and soforth, to Mary Duncan, his client did not mean to dispute it. "And, sir, further, as we were preparing evidence in support of my client's and her maid's affidavit, to prove her identity with the Mary Duncan in question, having served your client with a notice that such corroboratory evidence being unnecessary, we would move the Court, in case it were pressed for, to give us the costs of procuring it, Mr. Luke Gamble forthwith struck, on behalf of his client, and admitted the sufficiency of the evidence. Now, sir, I mention these things, not as expecting you to believe them upon my statement, you see, but simply to inquire of Mr. Gamble whether they be true or no; and if true, sir, upon his admission, then, sir, I submit we're entitled to your good offices, and the judicious inthurfarence of the Rev. Mr. Roach, your respectable priest, sir."

"My friend, sir, not my priest. I'm a churchman, sir, as everybody knows."

"Of course, sir—I ask your pardon again, Dr. Toole—sir, your friend to induce your client—friend. I mane, sir—Mistress Sarah Harty, formerly housekeeper of Mr. Charless (so he pronounced it) Nutther, gentleman, of the Mills, and soforth, to surrendher quiet and peaceable possession of the premises and chattels, and withdraw from her tortuous occupation dacently, and without provoking the consequences, which must otherwise follow in the sevarest o' forms;"

"The sevarest o' grandmothers. Humbug and flummery! sir," cried Toole, most unexpectedly incensed, and quite scarlet.

"D'ye mane I'm a liar, sir. Is that what you mane?" demanded Dirty Davy, suddenly, like the Doctor, getting rid of his ceremonious politeness.

"I mane what I mane, and that's what I mane," thundered Toole, diplomatically.

"Then, tell your friend to prepare for consequences," retorted Dirty Davy, with a grin.

"And make my compliments to your client, or conjuror, or wife, or whatever she is, and tell her that whenever she wants her dirty work done, there's plenty of other Dublin blackguards to be got to do it, without coming to Docthor Thomas Toole, or the Rev. Father Roach."

Which sarcasm he delivered with killing significance, but Dirty Davy had survived worse thrusts than that.

"She's a conjuror, is she? I thank you, sir."

"You're easily obliged sir," says Toole.

"We all know what that manes. And these documents, sworn to by my client and myself, is a pack o' lies! Betther and betther! I thank ye again, sir."

"You're welcome, my honey," rejoined Toole, affectionately.

"An' them two documents, sir, is a fabrication and a forgery backed up wid false affidavits?" continued Mr. O'Reagan.

"Mind that, Larry," says the Doctor, with a sudden inspiration, addressing the waiter, who had peeped in; "he admits that them two documents you see there, is forgeries, backed up with false affidavits; you heard him say so, and I'll call you to prove it."

"You lie!" said Dirty Davy precipitately, for he was quite disconcerted at finding his own sophistical weapons so unexpectedly turned against him.

"You scum o' the airth!" cried Toole, hitting him with his clenched fist right upon the nose, so vigorous a thump, that his erudite head with a sonorous crash hopped off the wainscot behind it; "you lying scullion!" roared the Doctor, instantaneously repeating the blow, and down went Davy, and down went the table with dreadful din, and the incensed Doctor bestrode his prostrate foe with clenched fists and flaming face, and his grand wig all awry, and he panting and scowling.

"Murder — help — help — murder—murder!" screamed Dirty Davy.

"Say it again, you cowardly, sneaking, spying viper; say it again can't you?"

It was a fine tableau, and a noble study of countenance and attitude.

How they were separated, and who the particular persons that interposed, what restoratives were resorted to, and what was the subsequent demeanour of Dr. Toole, upon the field of battle, I am not instructed; my letters stop short at the catastrophe, and run off to other matters.

Doctor Toole's agitation upon such encounters did not last long. They blew off in a few thundering claps of bravado and defiance in the second parlour of the Phoenix, where he washed his hands and re-adjusted his wig and ruffles, and strutted forth, squaring his elbows, and nodding and winking at the sympathizing waiters in the inn hall; and with a half grin at Larry—

"Well, Larry, I think I showed him Chapelized, hey?" said the Doctor, buoyantly, to that functionary, and marched diagonally across the broad street toward Sturk's house, with a gait and a countenance that might have overawed an army.

---

CHAPTER XC.

WHAT DOCTOR STURK BROUGHT TO MIND, AND ALL THAT DOCTOR TOOLE HEARD AT MR. LUKE GAMBLE'S.

Just as he reached Sturk's door, wagging his head and strutting grimly—and, palpably, still in debate with Dirty Davy—his thoughts received a sudden wrench in a different direction by the arrival of Mr. Justice Lowe, who pulled up his famous gray hunter at the steps of the house by the church-yard.

"You see, Doctor Toole, it won't do, waiting. The thing's too momentous."

And so they walked up stairs and into the drawing-room, and sent their compliments to Mrs. Sturk, who came down in de-habille, with her things pinned about her, and all over smiles. Poor little woman! Toole had not observed until now how very thin she had grown.

"He's going on delightfully, gentlemen; he drank a whole cup of tea, weak of course, Doctor Toole, as you bid me; and he eat a slice of toast, and liked it, and two Naples biscuits, Mr. Lowe, and I know he'll be delighted to see you."

"Very good, madam, very good," said Toole.

"And he's looking better already. He waked out of that sweet sleep not ten minutes after you left this morning."

"Ay, he was sleeping very quietly," said Toole to Lowe. "May we go up, ma'am?"

"Oh! he'll be overjoyed, gentlemen, to see you, and 'twill do him an infinity of good. I can scarce believe my eyes. And even the weather has taken up such beautiful sunshine; everything favourable."

"Well, Doctor Sturk," said Toole, cheerily, "we have a good account of you—a vastly good account, Doctor; we've been thinking of getting you down in a little while, Doctor, if all goes pleasantly; 'tis a lovely day, and a good omen—see how the sun shines in at the curtain."

But there was no responsive sunshine upon Sturk's stern, haggard face, as he said very low—still looking on the foot-board—"I thank you, Doctor."

So after a few more questions, and a little bit of talk with Mrs. Sturk, they got that good lady out of the room, and said Lowe to the patient—

"I'm sorry to trouble you, Doctor Sturk, but there's a weighty matter at which you last night hinted; and Doctor Toole thought you then too weak; and in your present state, I would not now ask you to speak at any length, were the matter of less serious moment."

"Yes, sir," said Sturk, but did not seem about to speak any more; and after a few seconds Lowe continued,

"I mean, Doctor Sturk, touching the murder of Mr. Beaucherc, which you then said was committed by the same Charles Archer, who assaulted you in the Park."

"Ay, sir," said Sturk.

"The same murder of which Lord Dunoran was adjudged guilty."

Sturk moved his lips with a sort of a nod.

"And, Doctor Sturk, you remember you then said you had yourself seen Charles Archer do that murder."

Sturk lifted his hand feebly enough to his forehead, and his lips moved, and his eyes closed. They thought he was praying—possibly he was; so they did not interrupt him; and he said, all on a sudden, but in a low dejected way, and with many pauses,

"Charles Archer. I never saw another such face; 'tis always before me. In a place, at Newmarket, where they played hazard, was once; and I saw him fight Beau Langton; and I saw him murder Mr. Beaucherc. I saw it all!" And the Doctor swore a shuddering oath.

"I lay in the small room or closet, off the chamber in which he slept. I was suffering under a bad fracture, and dosed with opium. 'Tis all very strange, sir. I saw everything that happened. I saw him stab Beaucherc. I think 'twas a dagger. It looked like a small bayonet. I'll tell you how—all, by-and-bye."

He sipped a little wine and water, and wiped his lips with a very tremulous handkerchief.

"I never spoke of it, for I could not. The whole of that five minutes' work slipped from my mind, and was gone quite and clean when I awoke. What I saw I could not interrupt.

I was in a cataleptic state, I suppose. I could not speak; but I saw like a lynx, and heard every whisper. When I wakened in the morning I remembered nothing. The knowledge was sealed up until the time came. A sight of Charles Archer's face at any time would have had, as I suppose, the same effect. When I saw him here, the first time, it was at the General's, at Belmont; though he was changed by time, and carefully disguised, all would not do. I felt the sight of him was fatal. I was quite helpless; but my mind never stopped working upon it till—till"—

"See now," said Toole, "there's time enough, and don't fatigue yourself. There, now, rest quiet a minute."

And he made him swallow some more wine; and felt his pulse; and shook his head despondingly at Lowe, behind his back.

"How is it?" said Sturk, faintly.

"A little irritable—that's all," said Toole.

"Till one night, I say,"—Sturk resumed, after a minute or two, "it came to me all at once awake—I don't know—or in a dream; in a moment I had it all. 'Twas like a page cut out of a book—lost for so many years." And Sturk moaned a despairing wish to heaven that the secret had never returned to him again.

"Yes, sir—like a page cut out of a book, and never missed till 'twas found again; and then, sharp and clear, every letter from first to last. Then, sir—then—thinking 'twas no use at that distance of time taking steps to punish him, I foolishly let him understand I knew him. My mind misgave me from the first. I think it was my good angel that warned me. But 'tis no use now. If I was wise I'd have left him alone. But 'tis no good fretting now. It was to be. I was too outspoken—and I let him know; and—and you see, he meant to make away with me. He tried to take my life, sir; and I think he has done it. I'll never rise from this bed, gentlemen."

"Come, Doctor Sturk, you musn't talk that way, Pell will be out this evening, and Dillon maybe—we'll put our heads together, and duce is in it or we'll set you on your legs again."

Sturk was screwing his lips sternly together, and the lines of his gruff haggard face were quivering, and a sullen tear or two started down from his closed eye.

"I'm a little nervous, gentlemen—I'll be right just now. I'd like to see the—the children, if they're in the way, that's all—by-and-bye, you know."

"I've got Pell out, you see—not that there's any special need—you know; but he was here before, and it wouldn't do to offend him; and he'll see you this afternoon."

"I thank you, sir," said Sturk, in the same dejected way.

"And, sir," said Lowe, "if you please, I'll get this statement into the shape of a deposition or information, for you see 'tis of the vastest imaginable importance, and exactly tallies with evidence we've got elsewhere, and 'twouldn't do, sir, to let it slip."

And Toole thought he saw a little flush mount into Sturk's sunken face, and he hastened to say—

"What we desire, Dr. Sturk, is to be able to act promptly in this case of my Lord Dunoran. Measures must be taken instantly, you see, for 'tis of old standing, and not a day to be lost, and there's why Mr. Lowe is so urgent to get your statement in white and black."

"And sworn to," added Mr. Lowe.

"I'll swear it," said Sturk, in the same sad tones.

And Mrs. Sturk came in, and Toole gave leave for chicken broth at twelve o'clock, about two table-spoonsful, and the same at half-past one, when he hoped to be back again. And on the lobby he gave her, with a cheery countenance, all the ambiguous comfort he could. And Lowe asked Mrs. Sturk for more pens and paper, and himself went down to give his man a direction at the door, and on the way, in the hall, Toole looking this way and that, to see if they weren't observed, beckoned him into the front parlour, and said he, in a low key—

"The pulse are up a bit, not very much, but still I don't like it—and very hard, you see—and what we've to dread, you know's inflammation; and he's so shocking low, my dear sir, we must let him have wine and other-things, or we'll lose him that way; and you see it's a mighty unpleasant case."

And coming into the hall, in a loud confident voice he cried—"And I'll be here again by half-past one o'clock."

And so he beckoned to the boy with his horse to come up, and chatted in the interim with Mr. Lowe upon the steps, and told him how to manage him if he grew exhausted over his narrative; and then, mounting his nag, he rode away for Dublin.

Toole, on reaching town, spurred on to the dingy residence of Mr. Luke Gamble. It must be allowed that he had no clear intention of taking any step whatsoever in consequence of what he might hear. But the little fellow was deuced curious; and Dirty Davy's confidence gave him a sort of right to be satisfied.

So with his whip under his arm, and a good deal out of breath, for the stairs were steep, he bounced into the attorney's sanctum.

"Who's that? Is that?—Why, bless my soul and body! 'tis yourself," cried Toole, after an astonished pause of a few seconds at the door, springing forward and grasping Nutter by both hands, and shaking them vehemently, and grinning very joyously and kindly the while.

Nutter received him cordially, but a little sheepishly. Indeed, his experiences of life, and the situations in which he had found himself since they had last met, were rather eccentric and instructive than quite pleasant to remember. And Nutter, in his way, was a proud fellow, and neither liked to be gaped at nor pitied.

But Toole was a thorough partisan of his, and had been urgent for permission to see him in gaol, and they knew how true he had been to poor Sally Nutter, and altogether felt very much at home with him.

So sitting in that twilight room, flanked with piles of expended briefs, and surrounded with neatly docketted packets of attested copies, notices, affidavits, and other engines of legal war—little Toole having expended his congratulations, and his private knowledge of Sturk's revelations, fell upon the immediate subject of his visit.

"That rogue, Davy O'Reegan, looked in on me, not an hour ago, at the Phoenix, (and he gave them a very spirited, but I'm afraid a somewhat fanciful description of the combat.) "And I'm afraid he'll give us a deal of trouble yet. He told me that the certificate——"

"Ay—here's a copy;" and Luke Gamble threw a paper on the table before him.

"That's it—Mary Duncan—1750—the very thing—the rascal! Well, he said, you know, but I knew better, that you had admitted the certificate formally."

"So I have, sir," said Mr. Gamble, drily.

"You have, sir?"

"I have!" and then followed a little pause, and Mr. Gamble said—

"I did so, sir, because there's no disputing it—and—and I think, Doctor Toole, I know something of my business."

There was another pause, during which Toole, flushed and shocked, turned his gaze from Gamble to Nutter.

"'Tis a true bill, then?" said Toole, scarcely above his breath and very dismally.

A swarthy flush covered Nutter's dark face. The man was ashamed.

"'Tis nigh eighteen years ago, sir," said Nutter, embarrassed, as he well might be. "I was a younger man, then, and, was bit, sir, as many another has been, and that's all."

Toole got up, stood before the fire-place, and hung his head with compressed lips, and there was a silence, interrupted by the hard man of law, who was now tumbling over his papers in search of a document, and humming a tune as he did so.

"It may be a good move for Charles Nutter, sir, but it looks very like a checkmate for poor Sally," muttered Toole, angrily.

Mr. Luke Gamble either did not hear him, or did not care a farthing what he said; and he hummed his tune very contentedly.

"And I had, moreover," said he, "to make another admission for the same reason, videlicet, that Mary Matchwell, the promonent in this suit, and Mary Duncan mentioned in that certificate, are one and the same person. Here's our answer to their notice, admitting the fact."

"I thank you," said Toole again, rather savagely, for a glance over his shoulder had shown him the attorney's face grinning with malicious amusement, as it seemed to him, while he readjusted the packet of papers from which he had just taken the notice; "I saw it, sir; your brother lawyer, Mr. O'Reegan, sir, showed it me this morning."

And Toole thought of poor little Sally Nutter, and all the wreck and ruin coming upon her and the Mills; and began to con over his own liabilities, and to reflect seriously whether he might not have committed himself rather dangerously; and especially the consequences of his morning's collision with Davy grew in darkness and magnitude very seriously, as he reflected that his entire statement had turned out to be true, and that he and his client were on the winning side.

"It seems to me, sir, you might have given some of poor Mrs. Nutter's friends at Chapelized a hint of the state of things. I, sir, and Father Roach—we've meddled, sir, more in the business than—than—but no matter now—and all under a delusion, sir. And poor Mistress Sally Nutter—she doesn't seem to trouble you much, sir."

"She has heard from us this morning," said Mr. Gamble, grinning on his watch, "and she knows all by this time; and 'tisn't a button to her."

And the attorney laughed in his face; and Nutter, who had looked sulky and uncomfortable, could resist no longer, and broke into a queer responsive grin. It seemed to Toole like a horrid dream.

There was a tap at the door just at this moment.

"Come in," cried Mr. Gamble, still exploding in comfortable little bursts of half-suppressed laughter.

"Oh! 'tis you? Very good, sir," said Mr. Gamble, sobering a little. He was the same lanky, vulgar, and slightly-squinting gentleman, pitted with the small-pox, whom Toole had seen on a former occasion. And the little Doctor thought he looked even more cunning and meaner than before.

"Here's a gentleman, sir," said Gamble, waving his pen towards Toole with a chuckle, "who believes that ladies like to recover their husbands."

The fellow grew red, and grinned a sly uneasy grin, looking stealthily at Toole, who was rapidly growing angry.

"Yes, sir, and one who believes, too, that gentlemen ought to protect their wives," added the little Doctor, hotly.

"As soon as they know who they are," muttered the attorney to his papers.

"I think, gentlemen, I'm rather in your way," said Toole with a gloomy briskness; "I think 'tis better I should go. I—I'm somewhat amazed, gentlemen, and I—I wish you a good morning."

And Toole made them a very stern bow, and walked out at the wrong door.

"This way, by your leave, Doctor," said Mr. Gamble, opening the right one; and at the head of the stairs he took Toole by the cuff, and said he—

"After all, 'tis but just the wrong Mrs. Nutter should give place to the right; and if you go down to the Mills to-morrow, you'll find she's by no means so bad as you think her."

But Toole broke away from him sulkily, with—

"I wish you a good morning, sir."

It was quite true that Sally Nutter was to hear from Charles and Mr. Gamble that morning; for about the time at which Toole was in conference with those two gentlemen in Dublin, two coaches drew up at the Mills.

Mr. Gamble's conducting gentleman was in one, and two mysterious personages sat in the other.

"I want to see Mrs. Nutter," said Mr. Gamble's emissary.

"Mrs. Nutter's in the parlour, at your service," answered the lean grinning maid who had opened the door, and who recognising in that gentleman an adherent of the enemy, had assumed her most impertinent leer and tone on the instant.

The ambassador looked in and drew back.

"Oh, then, 'tisn't the mistress you want, but the master's old housekeeper; ask her."

And she pointed with her thumb toward Moggy, whose head was over the banister.

So, as he followed that honest hand-maiden up stairs, he drew from his coat-pocket a bundle of papers, and glanced at their endorsements, for he had a long exposition to make, and then some important measures to execute.

Toole had to make up for lost time; and as he rode at a smart canter into the village, he fancied he observed the signs of an unusual excitement there. There were some faces at the windows, some people on the door-steps; and a few groups in the street; they were all looking in the Dublin direction. He had a nod or two as he passed. Toole thought forthwith of Mr. David O'Reegan—and a dim horror of some unknown summary process dismayed him; but his hall-door shone peaceably in the sun, and his boy stood whistling on the steps, with his hands in his pockets. Nobody had been there since, and Pell had not yet called at Sturk's.

"And what's happened—what's the neighbours lookin' after?" said Toole, as his own glance followed the general direction, so soon as he had dismounted.

"'Twas a coach that had driven through the town, at a thundering pace, with some men inside, from the Knockmareon direction, and a lady that was screeching. She broke one of the coach windows in Martin's-row, and the other—there, just opposite the Phoenix." The glass was glittering on the road. "She had rings on her hand, and her knuckles were bleeding, and it was said 'twas poor Mrs. Nutter going away with the keepers to a mad-house."

Toole turned pale and ground his teeth, looking towards Dublin.

"I passed it myself near Island-bridge; I did hear screeching, but I thought 'twas from t'other side of the wall. There was a fellow in an old blue and silver coat with the driver—eh?"

"The same," said the boy; and Toole, with difficulty swallowing down his rage, hurried into his house, resolved to take Lowe's advice on the matter, and ready to swear to poor Sally's perfect sanity—"the crature!—the villains!"

But now he had only a moment to pull off his boots, to get into his grand costume, and seize his cane and his muff, too—for he sported one; and so transformed and splendid, he marched down the paved trottoir—Doctor Pell, happily, not yet arrived—to Sturk's house. There was a hackney coach near the steps.

---

CHAPTER XCI.

IN WHICH DOCTOR PELL DECLINES A FEE, AND DOCTOR STURK
A PRESCRIPTION.

ON entering the front parlour from whence, in no small excitement, there issued the notes of a coarse diapason, which he fancied was known to him, he found Mr. Justice Lowe in somewhat tempestuous conference with the visiter.

He was, in fact, no other than Black Dillon; black enough he looked just now. He had only a moment before returned from a barren visit to the Brass Castle, and was in no mood to be trifled with.

"'Twasn't I, sir, but Mr. Dangerfield, who promised you five hundred guineas," said Mr. Lowe, with a dry nonchalance.

"Five hundred fiddles," retorted Doctor Dillon, and Toole at that moment entering the door, and divining the situation from the Doctor's famished glare and wild gestures, exploded, I'm sorry to say, in a momentary burst of laughter into his cocked hat. 'Twas instantly stifled, however; and when Dillon turned his flaming eyes upon him, the little Doctor made him a bow of superlative gravity, which the furious hero of the trepan was too full of his wrongs to notice in any way.

"I was down at his house, bedad, the 'Brass Castle,' if you please, and not a brass farthin' for my pains, nothing there be but an ould woman, as ould and ugly as himself, or the devil—be gannies! An' he's levanted, or else tuck for debt. Brass Castle! brass forehead, bedad. An' where, sir, am I to get my five hundhred guineas—where, 'sir?" he thundered, staring first in Lowe's face, then in Toole's, and dealing the table a lusty blow at each interrogatory.

"I think, sir," said Lowe, anticipating Toole, "you'd do well to consider the sick man, sir." The noise was certainly considerable.

"I don't know, sir, that the sick man's considerin' me much," retorted Doctor Dillon. "Sick man—sick grandmother's aunt! Why there's not a crature livin' barrin' a natural eediot, or an apothecary, that doesn't know the man's dead; he's dead, sir; but 'tisn't so with me; an' I can't get on without vittles, and vittles isn't to be had without money; that's logic, Mr. Justice; that's a medical fact, Mr. Docthor. An' how am I to get my five hundhred guineas? I say, you and you—the botho' ye—that prevented me of going last night to his brass castle—an' gettin' my money. I hold you both liable to me—one an' 'tother—the both o' ye."

"Why, sir," said Lowe, "'tis a honorarium."

"'Tis no such thing, sir; 'tis a contract," thundered Dillon, pulling Dangerfield's note of promise from his pocket, and dealing it a mighty slap with the back of his hand.

"Contract or no, sir, there's nobody liable for it but himself."

"We'll try that, sir; and in the meantime, what the devil am I to do, I'd be glad to know; for strike me crooked if I have a crown piece to pay the coachman."

"If you'll only listen, sir, I'll show you your case is well enough. Mr. Dangerfield, as you call him, has not left the country; and though he's arrested, 'tisn't for debt. If he owes you the money, 'tis your own fault if you don't make him pay it, for I'm credibly informed he's worth more than a hundred thousand pounds."

"And where is he, sir?" demanded Black Dillon, much more cheerfully and amicably.

"He lies in the county gaol, sir, on a serious criminal charge; but a line from me, sir, will, I think, gain you admission to him forthwith.

"I'll be much obliged for it, sir, answered Dillon. "What o'clock is it?" he asked of Toole; for though it is believed he owned a watch, it was sometimes not about him; and while Lowe scribbled a note, Toole asked in a dignified way—

"Have you seen our patient, sir?"

"Not I. Didn't I see him last night. The man's dead. He's in the last stage of exhaustion with an inflammatory pulse. If you feed him up he'll die of inflammation; and if you don't he'll die of wakeness. He's gone, sir. Pell's coming, I hear. I'd wait if I could; but I must look after business; and there's no good to be done here. I thank you, Mr. Lowe—Sir—your most obedient servant, Doctor Toole."— And with Lowe's note in his breeches' pocket, he strode out to the steps, and whistled for his coachman, who drove his respectable employer tipsily to his destination.

I dare say the interview was characteristic; but I can find no account of it. I am pretty sure, however, that he did not get a shilling. So at least he stated in his declaration, in the action against Lowe, in which he, or rather his attorney, was non-suited, with grievous loss of costs.

Just as he drove away, poor little Mrs. Sturk looked in.

"Is there anything, ma'am?" asked Toole, a little uneasily.

"Only—only, I think he's just a little frightened—he's so nervous, you know—by that Dublin doctor's loud talking—and he's got a kind of trombling—a shivering."

"Eh—a shivering, ma'am?" said Toole, "Like a man that's taken a cold, eh?"

"Oh, he hasn't got cold—I'm sure—There's no danger of that. It's only nervous; so I covered him up with another pair of blankets, and gave him a hot drink."

"Very good, ma'am; I'll follow you up in a minute."

"And even if it was, you know he shakes off cold in no time, he has such a fine constitution."

"Yes, ma'am—that's true—very good, ma'am. I'll be after you."

So up stairs went Mrs. Sturk in a fuss.

"That's it," said Toole, so soon as they were alone, nodding two or three times dejectedly, and looking very glum. "It's set in—the inflammation—it's set in, sir. He's gone. That's the rigor."

"Poor gentleman," said Lowe, after a short pause, "I'm much concerned for him, and for his family."

"'Tis a bad business," said Toole, gloomily, like a man that's frightened. And he followed Mrs. Sturk, leaving Lowe adjusting his papers in the parlour.

Toole found his patient laden with blankets, and shivering like a man in an ague, with blue, sunken face. And he slipped his hand under the clothes, and took his pulse, and said nothing but—"Ay—ay—ay"—quietly to himself, from time to time, as he did so; and Sturk—signing, as well as he could, that he wanted a word in his ear—whispered, as well as his chattering teeth would let him.

"You know what this is."

"Well—well—there now, there; drink some of this," said Toole, a little flurried, and trying to seem cool.

"I think he's a little bit better, Doctor," whispered poor little Mrs. Sturk, in Toole's ear.

"'Twill pass away, ma'am."

Toole was standing by the bed-side, looking rather wofully and frightened on Sturk's face, and patting and smoothing the coverlet with the palm of his hand.

Just then came the roll of a coach to the door, and a long peal at the knocker; and little Toole ran down to meet the great Doctor Pell in the hall. He was in, in a moment, and turned aside with Toole into the drawing-room. It was only a conference of about two minutes. And Doctor Pell said in his usual tall way, as they came out—

"How long ago, sir?"

"About ten—no, hardly so much—eight minutes ago," answered Toole, as he followed that swift phantom up the stairs.

"Your most obedient, ma'am," said the slim and lofty Doctor, parenthetically, saluting the good lady; and he stood by the bed-side, having laid his muff on the chair.

"Well, sir, and how do you feel? There now, that will do, sir; don't mind speaking; I see." And he put his hand under the clothes, and laid it on Sturk's arm, and slid it down to his hand, and felt his pulse.

"And he's been near ten minutes this way?" said the Doctor.

"Oh, he was a great-deal worse; 'tis a vast deal better now; isn't it, Doctor Toole?"

"The rigor is subsiding, then. Has he had a sweat, ma'am?" said Pell.

"Oh, no—nothing like—quite nice and cool, Doctor—and no fever; nice quiet sleep; and his appetite wonderful; tell him, Dr. Toole."

"Oh, yes, ma'am—Dr. Pell knows; I told him all, ma'am," said Toole, who was looking with a blank and dismal sort of contemplation upon Sturk's fallen countenance.

"Well, ma'am," said Pell, as he looked on his watch, "this rigor, you see, will soon pass away, and you're doing everything we could wish, and (for he found he had time to scribble a prescription,) we'll just order him a trifle. Good day, sir. Your most obedient, ma'am."

"Pen and ink in the drawing-room, Doctor Pell," said Toole, reverentially.

"Oh! no, no, madam, excuse me," murmured Dr. Pell, gently pressing back Mrs. Sturk's fee, the residuum of Dangerfield's bounty, with his open palm.

"Oh, but Doctor Pell," urged she, in a persuasive aside, half behind him, in the shadow of the doorway.

"Pray, madam, no more—pardon me," and Dr. Pell, with a peremptory bow, repelled his fee.

And the Doctor descended, not hastily, but very swiftly; and was in the drawing-room, and the door shut.

"Gone, poor gentleman!" said Toole, in an under tone—his phraseology became refined in Pell's presence.

Pell held the pen in his thin lips, while he tore off half-sheet of paper, and only shook his head funereally.

So taking the pen in his fingers he said, "We'll give him so and so, if you approve."

"Very good, sir," said Toole, deferentially; and Pell, not seeming to hear, dashed off a few spattered lines, with necromantic circles and zigzags at the end of each.

Pell, looking again at his watch, was Doctor Toole's very obedient servant, and was waylaid by poor little Mrs. Sturk on the lobby.

"Well, madam, we've put our heads together, and ordered a little matter; and that rigor—that shivering fit—will subside; and we trust he'll be easier then; and you've a very competent adviser in Doctor a—a——"

"Toole," suggested the eager little woman.

"Doctor Toole, madam, and he'll direct whatever may be necessary; and should he wish to consult again, you can send for me; but he's quite competent, madam, and he'll tell you all we think.

He had got to the end of the stairs while talking, and made his adieu, and glided down and out; and before poor little Mrs. Sturk bethought her how little she had got from him, she heard the roll of his coach-wheels whirling him back again to Dublin. I believe few doctors grow so accustomed to the ghastly eclaircissement as not very willingly to shirk it when they may.

Toole shrank from it, too, and dodged, and equivocated, and evaded all he could; but he did admit there was an unfavourable change; and when he had gone—promising to be back at four o'clock—poor little Mrs. Sturk broke down—all alone in the drawing-room—and cried a passionate flood of tears; and thinking she was top long away, dried her eyes quickly, and ran up, and into Barney's room with a smile on; and she battled with the evil fear; and hope, that faithful angel that clings to the last, hovered near her with blessed illusions, until an hour came, next day, in the evening, about four o'clock, when from Barney's room there came a long, wild cry. It was "his poor foolish little Letty"—the long farewell—and the "noble Barney" was gone. The courtship and the married days—all a faded old story now; and a few days later, reversed arms, and muffled drums, and three volleys in the church-yard, and a little file of wondering children, dressed in black, whom the old General afterwards took up in his arms, one by one, very kindly, and kissed, and told them they were to come and play in Belmont whenever they liked, and to eat fruit in the garden, and a great deal more; for all which a poor little lady, in a widow's cap, and a lonely room, hard-by, was very grateful.

---

CHAPTER XCII.

ABOUT THE RIGHTFUL MRS. NUTTER OF THE MILLS, AND HOW MR. MERVYN RECEIVED THE NEWS.

MR. GAMBLE'S conducting clerk had gone up stairs to Mistress Nutter's door, and being admitted, had very respectfully asked leave to open, for that lady's instruction, a little statement which he was charged to make.

This was in substance, that Archibald Duncan, Mary Matchwell's husband, was in Dublin, and had sworn informations against her for bigamy; and that a warrant having been issued for her arrest upon that charge, the constables had arrived at the Mills for the purpose of executing it, and removing the body of the delinquent, M. M., to the custody of the turnkey; that measures would be taken on the spot to expel the persons who had followed in her train; and that Mr. Charles Nutter himself would arrive in little more than an hour, to congratulate his good wife, Sally, on the termination of their troubles, and to take quiet possession of his house.

You can imagine how Sally Nutter received all this, with clasped hands and streaming eyes, looking in the face of the man of notices and attested copies, unable to speak—unable quite to believe. But before he came to the end of his dry and delightful narrative, a loud yell and a scuffle in the parlour were heard; a clamour of warring voices; a dreadful crash of glass; a few curses and oaths in basses and barytones; and some laughter from the coachmen, who viewed the fray from outside through the window. It was the critical convulsion; the evil spirit was being eliminated, and the tenement stunned, bruised, and tattered, about to be at peace.

Of Charles Nutter's doings and adventures during the terrible interval between his departure on the night of Mary Matchwell's first visit to the Mills, and his return on this evening to the same abode, there is a brief outline, in the first person, partly in answer to questions, and obviously intended to constitute a memorandum for his attorney's use. I shall reprint it with your leave—as it is not very long—verbatim.

“When that woman came out to the Mills,” says this document, “I could scarce believe my eyes; I knew her temper; she was always damnably wicked; but I had found out all about her long ago; and I was amazed at her audacity. What she said was true—we were married; or rather we went through the ceremony at St. Clement Danes, in London, in the year '50. I could not gainsay that; but I well knew what she thought was known but to herself and another. She had a husband living then. We lived together little more than three months. We were not a year parted when I found out all about him; and I never expected more trouble from her.

“I knew all about him, then. But seventeen years bring many changes; and I feared he might be dead. He was a saddler in Edinburgh, and his name was Duncan. I made up my mind to go thither straight. Next morning the Lovely Betty, packet, was to sail for Holyhead. I took money, and set out without a word to anybody. The wretch had told my poor wife, and showed her the certificate, and so left her half mad.

“I swore to her 'twas false. I told her to wait a bit, and she would see. I don't think she half understood what I said, for she was at her wits' ends. I was scarce better myself first. 'Twas a good while before I resolved on this course, and saw my way, and worse thoughts were in my head; but so soon as I made up my mind to this, I grew cool. I don't know how it happened that my foot-prints by the river puzzled them; 'twas all accident; I was thinking of no such matter; I did not go through the village, but through the Knockmaroon gate; 'twas dark by that time; I only met two men with a cart—they did not know me—Dublin men, I think. I crossed the Park in a straight line for Dublin; I did not meet a living soul; 'twas dark, but not very dark. When I reached the Butcher's Wood, all on a sudden

I heard a horrid screech, and two blows quick, one after the other, to my right, not three score steps away—heavy blows—they sounded like the strokes of a man beating a carpet.

“With the first alarm, I hallo’d, and ran in the direction, shouting as I went; ’twas as I ran heard the second blow; I saw no one, and heard no other sound; the noise I made myself in running might prevent it. I can’t say how many seconds it took to run the distance—not many; I run fast; I was not long in finding the body; his white vest and small clothes showed under the shadow; he seemed quite dead. I thought when first I took his hand, there was a kind of a quiver in his fingers; but that was over immediately. His eyes and mouth were a bit open; the blood was coming very fast, and the wounds on his head looked very deep—frightful—as I conjectured they were done with a falchion, (a name given to a heavy wooden sword resembling a New Zealand weapon); there was blood coming from one ear, and his mouth; there was no sign of life about him; and I thought him quite dead. I would have lifted him against a tree, but his head looked all in a smash, and I daren’t move him. I knew him for Doctor Sturk, of the Artillery; he wore his regimentals; I did not see his hat; his head was bare when I saw him.

“When I saw ’twas Doctor Sturk, I was frightened; he had treated me mighty ill, and I resented it, which I did not conceal; and I thought ’twould look very much against me if I were any way mixed up in this dreadful occurrence—especially not knowing who did it—and being alone with the body so soon after ’twas done. I crossed the Park wall, therefore; but by the time I came near Barrack-street, I grew uneasy in my mind, lest Doctor Sturk should still have life in him, and perish for want of help. I went down to the river-side, and washed my hands, for there was blood upon ’em, and while so employed by mischance I lost my hat in the water and could not recover it. I stood for a while by the river bank; it was a lonely place; I was thinking of crossing there first, I was so frightened ; I changed my mind, however, and went round by Bloody-bridge.

"The further I went the more fearful I grew, lest Sturk should die for want of help that I might send him ; and although I thought him dead, I got such a dread of this over me as I can't describe. I saw two soldiers opposite the 'Royal Oak' inn, and I told them I overheard a fellow speak of an officer that lay wounded in the Butcher's Wood, not far from the Park-wall, and gave them half-a-crown to have search made, which they promised, and took the money.

"I crossed Bloody-bridge, and got into a coach, and so to Luke Gamble's. I told him nothing of Sturk ; I had talked foolishly to him, and did not know what even he might think. I told him all about M. M.'s that is Mary Duncan's turning up ; she went by that name in London, and kept a lodging-house. I took his advice on the matter, and sailed next morning. The man Archie Duncan, had left Edinburgh, but I traced him to Carlisle and thence to York, where I found him. He was in a very poor way, and glad to hear that Demirep was in Dublin, and making money. When I came back I was in the Hue-and-Cry for the assault on Sturk.

"I took no precaution, not knowing what had happened ; but 'twas night when we arrived, Duncan and I, and we went straight to Gamble's, and he concealed me. I kept close within his house, except on one night, when I took coach. I was under necessity, as you shall hear, to visit Chapelizod. I got out in the hollow of the road by the Knockmaroon pond, in the Park ; an awful night it was—the night of the snow-storm, when the brig was wrecked off the Black Rock, you remember. I wanted to get some papers necessary to my case against Mary Duncan. I had the key of the glass door ; the inside fastening was broke, and there was no trouble in getting in. But the women had sat up beyond their hour, and saw me. I got the papers, however, and returned, having warned them not to speak. I ventured out of doors but once more, and was took on a warrant for assaulting Sturk. 'Twas the women talking as they did excited the officers' suspicions.

"I have lain in prison since. The date of my committal and discharge are, I suppose, there."

And so ends this rough draft, with the initials, I think, in his own hand, C. N., at the foot.

At about half-past four o'clock Nutter came out to the Mills in a coach. He did not drive through Chapelizod; he was shy, and wished to feel his way a little. So he came home privily by the Knockmaroon Park-Gate. Poor little Sally rose into a sort of heroine. With a wild cry, and "Oh, Charlie!" she threw her arms about his neck; and the "good little crayture," as Magnolia was wont to call her, had fainted. Nutter said nothing, but carried her in his arms to the sofa, and himself sobbed very violently for about a minute, supporting her tenderly. She came to herself very quickly, and hugged her Charlie with such a torrent of incoherent endearments, welcomes, and benedictions as I cannot at all undertake to describe. Nutter didn't speak. His arms were about her, and with wet eyes, and biting his nether-lip, and smiling, he looked into her poor little wild, delighted face with an unspeakable world of emotion and affection beaming from the homely lines and knots of that old mahogany countenance.

"Oh! Charlie, I have you fast, my darling. Oh! but it's wonderful; you, yourself—my Charlie, your own self—never, never, oh, never to part again!" and so on.

And so for a rapturous hour, it seemed as if they had passed the dark valley, and were immortal; and no more pain, sorrow, or separation for them.

It is not always that the person most interested in a rumour is first to hear it. It was reported in Chapelizod, early that day, that Irons, the clerk, had made some marvellous discovery respecting Lord Dunoran, and the murder of which an English jury had found that nobleman guilty. Had people known that Mervyn was the son of that dishonoured peer—he would not have wanted a visiter to enlighten him half an hour after the rumour had begun to proclaim itself in the streets and public haunts of the village. No one, however, thought of the haughty and secluded young gentleman who lived so ascetic a life at the Tiled House, and hardly ever showed in the town, except in church on Sundays.

When the report did reach him, and he heard that Lowe, who knew all about it, was at the Phoenix, where he was holding a conference with a gentleman from the Crown Office, half wild with excitement, he hurried thither. There having declared himself to the magistrate and his companion, he heard with such feelings as may be imagined, the magistrate read aloud, not only the full and clear information of Irons, but the equally distinct deposition of Doctor Stark, and was made aware of the complete identification of the respectable and vivacious Paul Dangerfield with the dead and damned Charles Archer!

On hearing all this, the young man rode straight to Belmont, where he was closetted with the General for fully twenty minutes. They parted in a very friendly way, but he did not see the ladies. The General, however, no sooner bid him farewell at the door-steps than he made his way to the drawing-room, and, big with his amazing secret, first, in a very grave and almost agitated way, told Little "Toodie," as he called his daughter, to run away and leave him together with Aunt Rebecca, which being done, he anticipated that lady's imperious summons to explain himself by telling her, in his blunt, soldierly fashion, the wondrous story.

Aunt Becky was utterly confounded. She had seldom before in her life been so thoroughly taken in. What a marvellous turn of fortune! What a providential deliverance and vindication for that poor young Lord Dunoran! What an astounding exposure of that miscreant, Mr. Dangerfield!

"What a blessed escape the child has had!" interposed the General, with a rather testy burst of gratitude.

"And how artfully she and my Lord contrived to conceal their engagement!" pursued Aunt Rebecca, covering her somewhat confused retreat.

But, somehow, Aunt Rebecca was by no means angry. On the contrary, any one who knew her well would have perceived that a great weight was taken off her mind.

The consequences of Dangerfield's incarceration upon these awful charges, were not confined altogether to the Tiled House and the inhabitants of Belmont.

No sooner was our friend Cluffe well assured that Dangerfield was in custody of the gaoler, and that his old theory of a certain double plot carried on by that intriguing personage, with the object of possessing the hand and thousands of Aunt Rebecca, was now and for ever untenable, than he wrote to London forthwith to countermand the pelican. The answer, which in those days was rather long about coming, was not pleasant, being simply a refusal to rescind the contract.

Cluffe, in a frenzy, carried this piece of mercantile insolence off to his lawyer. The stout Captain was, however, undoubtedly liable, and, with a heavy heart, he wrote to beg they would, with all dispatch, sell the bird in London on his account, and charge him with the difference.

In due course, however, came an answer, informing Captain Cluffe that his letter had arrived too late, as the bird had been shipped for him to Dublin by the Fair Venus, with a proper person in charge, on the Thursday morning previous. Good Mrs. Mason, his landlady, had no idea what was causing the awful commotion in the Captain's room; the fitful and violent soliloquies; the stamping of the Captain up and down the floor; and the contusions, palpably, suffered by her furniture. The Captain's temper was not very pleasant that evening, and he was filgetty and feverish besides, expecting every moment a note from town to apprise him of its arrival.

However, he walked up to Belmont a week or two after, and had a very consolatory reception from Aunt Becky. He talked upon his old themes, and upon the subject of Puddock, was, as usual, very friendly and intercessorial; in fact, she showed at last signs of yielding.

"Well, Captain Cluffe, tell him if he cares to come, he may come, and be on the old friendly footing; but be sure you tell him he owes it all to you."

And positively, as she said so, Aunt Rebecca looked down upon her fan; and Cluffe thought, looked a little flushed, and confused too; whereat the gallant fellow was so elated that he told her all about the pelican, discarding as unworthy of consideration, under circumstances so imminently promising, a little plan he had formed of keeping the bird privately in Dublin, and looking out for a buyer.

Poor little Puddock, on the other hand, had heard, more than a week before this message of peace arrived, the whole story of Gertrude's engagement to Lord Dunoran, as we may now call Mr. Mervyn, with such sensations as may be conjectured. His heart, of course, was torn; but having sustained some score of similar injuries in that region upon other equally harrowing occasions, he recovered upon this with all favourable symptoms, and his wounds healed with the first intention.

The good little fellow was very glad to hear from Cluffe, who patronised him most handsomely, that Aunt Rebecca had consented to receive him once more into her good graces.

"And the fact is, Puddock, I think I may undertake to promise, you'll never again be misunderstood in that quarter," said Cluffe, with a mysterious sort of smile.

"I'm sure, dear Cluffe, I'm grateful as I ought, for your generous pleading on my poor behalf, and I do prize the good will of that most excellent lady as highly as any, and owe her, beside, a debt of gratitude for care and kindness such as many a mother would have failed to bestow."

"Mother, indeed! Why, Puddock, my boy, you forget you're no chicken," said Cluffe, a little high.

"And to-morrow I will certainly pay her my respects," said the Lieutenant, not answering Cluffe's remark.

So Gertrude Chatterworth, after her long agitation—often despair—was tranquil at last, and blessed in the full assurance of the love which was henceforth to be her chief earthly happiness.

"Madam was very sly," said Aunt Becky, with a little shake of her head, and a quizzical smile. "Why, Mr. Mordaunt, on the very day—the day we had the pleasant luncheon on the grass—when, as I thought, she had given you your quietus—'twas quite the reverse, and you had made a little betrothal, and duped the old people so cleverly ever after."

"You have forgiven me, dear Aunt," said the young lady, kissing her very affectionately, "but I will never quite forgive myself. In a moment of great agitation I made a hasty promise of secrecy, which, from the moment 'twas made, was to me a never-resting disquietude, misery, and reproach."

"Indeed, dear madam," said Mordaunt—or as we may now call him, Lord Dunoran—coming to the rescue, "'twas all my doing; on me alone rests all the blame. Selfish it hardly was. I could not risk the loss of my beloved; and until my fortunes had improved, to declare our situation would have been too surely to lose her. Henceforward I have done with mystery. I will never have a secret from her, nor she from you."

He took Aunt Becky's hand; "Am I, too, forgiven?"

Aunt Becky smiled, with one of her pleasant little blushes, and looked down on the carpet, and was silent for a moment; and then, as they afterwards thought a little oddly, she said,

"That censor must be more severe than I, who would say that concealment in matters of the heart is never justifiable; and, indeed, my dears," she added quite in an humble way, "I almost think you were right."

Everything was now going prosperously for Mervyn—or let us call him henceforward Lord Dunoran. Against the united evidence of Sturk and Irons, two independent witnesses, the Crown were of opinion that no defence was maintainable by the wretch, Archer. The two murders were unambiguously sworn to by both witnesses. A correspondence, afterwards read in the Irish House of Lords, was carried on between the Irish and the English law officers of the Crown as to which crime he should be first tried for—the murder of Sturk, or that of Beaucherc. The latter was, in this respect, the most momentous—that the cancelling of the forfeiture which had ruined the Duñoran family depended upon it.

The result was, however, that their prisoner was to be first tried in Ireland for the murder of Doctor Barnabas Sturk.

A few pieces of evidence, slight, but sinister, also turned up. Captain Cluffe was quite clear he had seen an instrument in the prisoner's hand on the night of the murder, as he looked into the little bedchamber of the Brass Castle, so unexpectedly. When he put down the towel, he raised it from the toilet, where it lay. It resembled the but of a whip—was an inch or so longer than a drumstick, and six or seven inches of the thick end stood out in a series of circular bands or rings. He rinsed the thick end of it in the basin; it seemed to have a spring in it, and Cluffe thought it was a sort of loaded baton. Dangerfield had only run it once or twice hastily through the water rolled it in a red handkerchief, and threw it into his drawer which he locked. When Cluffe was shown the whip, which bore a rude resemblance to this instrument, and which Lowe had assumed to be all that Cluffe had really seen, the gallant Captain peremptorily pooh-poohed it. 'Twas no such thing. The whip-handle was light in comparison, and it was too long to fit it in the drawer.

Now, the awful fractures which had almost severed Sturk's skull corresponded exactly with the wounds which such an instrument would inflict, and a tubular piece of broken iron about two inches long, exactly corresponding with the shape of the loading described by Cluffe, was actually discovered in the sewer of the Brass Castle. It had been in the fire, and the wood or whalebone, was burnt completely away. It was conjectured that Dangerfield had believed it to be lead, and having burnt the handle, had broken the metal which he could not melt, and made away with it in the best way he could.

---

CHAPTER XCIII.

IN WHICH OBEDIAH ARRIVES.

IN the meantime our worthy little Lieutenant Puddock—by this time quite reconciled to the new state of things, walked up to Belmont, with his head a great deal fuller—of the interview pending between him and Aunt Becky than of the little romance which had exploded so unexpectedly about a fortnight ago.

Aunt Becky received him in the drawing-room. She was looking very pale, and spoke very little, and very gently for her. In a reconciliation between two persons of the opposite sexes—though the ages be wide apart—there is almost always some little ingredient of sentiment.

The door was shut, and Puddock's voice was heard in an indistinct murmur upon the lobby. Then there was a silence, or, possibly, some speaking in a still lower key. Then Aunt Becky was crying, and the Lieutenant's voice cooing through it. Then Aunt Becky, still crying, said—

"A longer time than you think for, Lieutenant; two years, and more—always." And the Lieutenant's voice rose again; and she said—"What a fool I've been;" which was again lost in Puddock's accents; and the drawing-room door opened, and Aunt Rebecca ran up stairs, with her handkerchief to her red nose and eyes, and slammed her bed-room door after her like a boarding-school miss.

And the general's voice was heard shouting "luncheon" in the hall; and Dominick told Puddock, who stood, unusually pale and very much stunned, with the handle of the open drawing-room door in his hand, looking up toward the bedroom in an undecided sort of way, as if he was not clear whether it was not his duty to follow Aunt Becky. On being told a second time, however, that the General awaited him at luncheon, he seemed to apprehend the meaning of the message, and went down to the parlour forthwith.

The General, and my Lord Dunoran, and Miss Gertrude, and honest Father Roach, were there; and Aunt Becky, being otherwise engaged, could not come.

Puddock, at luncheon, was abstracted—frightened—silent, for the most part; talking only two or three sentences during that sociable meal, by fits and starts; and he laughed once abruptly at a joke he did not hear. He also drank three glasses of port.

Aunt Rebecca met him with her hood on in the hall. She asked him, with a flattering sort of carelessness, looking very hard at the clock, and nearly with her back to him—

“Lientenant, will you take a turn in the garden with me?”

To which Puddock, with almost a start—for he had not seen her till she spoke—and, upon my word, 'tis a fact, with a blush, too—made a sudden smile, and a bow, and a suitable reply in low tones; and forth they sallied together, and into the garden, and up and down the same walk, for a good while—with none but Peter Brian, the gardener, whom they did not see, to observe them.

When they came to the white wicket-door of the garden Aunt Rebecca hastily dropped his arm, on which she had leaned; and together they returned to the house very affably; and there Aunt Becky bid him good-bye in a whisper, a little hastily; and Puddock, so soon as he found Dominick, asked for the General.

He had gone down to the river; and Puddock followed. As he walked along the court, he looked up; there was a kind of face at the window. He smiled a great deal and raised his hat, and placed it to its heart, and felt quite bewildered, like a man in a dream; and in this state he marched down to the river's bank.

They had not been together for a full minute when the stout General threw back his head, looking straight in his face; and then he stepped first one, then another, fat little pace backward, and poked his cane right at the ribs of the plump little Lieutenant, then closing with him, he shook both Puddock's hands in both his, with a hearty peal of laughter.

Then he takes Puddock under his arm. Puddock has to stoop to pick up his hat which the General had dislodged. And so the General walks him slowly towards the house; sometimes jogging his elbow a little under his ribs; sometimes calling a halt and taking his collar in his finger and thumb, thrusting him out a little, and eyeing him over with a sort of swagger, and laughing and coughing, almost to strangulation; and altogether extraordinarily boisterous, and hilarious, and familiar, as Cluffe thought, who viewed this spectacle from the avenue.

Mr. Sterling would not have been quite so amused at a similar freak of Mrs. Hidleberg's—but our honest General was no especial worshipper of money—he was rich too, and his daughter well dowered, was about to marry a Peer, and beside all this, though he loved "Sister Becky," her yoke galled him; and I think he was not altogether sorry at the notion of a little more liberty.

At the same moment honest Peter Brien, having set his basket of winter greens down upon the kitchen-table, electrified his auditory by telling them with a broad grin and an oath, that he had seen Lieutenant Puddock and Aunt Rebecca kiss in the garden, with a good smart smack, "by the powers, within three yards of his elbow, when he was stooping down cutting them greens!" At which profanity, old Mistress Dorothy, Aunt Rebecca's maid, was so incensed that she rose and left the kitchen without a word.

Captain Cluffe was asking for Aunt Rebecca when Puddock and the General reached the hall-door, and was surprised to learn that she was not to be seen. "If she knew 'twas I," he thought; "but no matter."

"Oh, we could have told you that; eh, Puddock?" cried the General; "'tisn't everybody can see my sister to-day, Captain; a very peculiar engagement, eh, Puddock?" and a sly wink and a chuckle.

Cluffe smiled a little, and looked rather conscious and queer, but pleased with himself; and his eyes wandered over the front windows hastily, to see if Aunt Becky was looking out, for he fancied there was something in the General's quizzing, and that the lady might have said more than she quite intended to poor little Puddock on the subject of the gallant mediator; and that, in fact, he was somehow the theme of some little sentimental disclosure of the lady's. What the plague else could they both mean by quizzing Cluffe about her?

Puddock and he had not gone half-way down the short avenue, when Cluffe said, with a sheepish smile,

"Miss Rebecca Chatterworth dropped something in her talk with you, Puddock, I see that plain enough, my dear fellow, which the General has no objection I should hear, and hang it, I don't see any myself."

At first Puddock was reserved, but recollecting that he had been left quite free to tell whom he pleased, he made up his mind to unbosom; and suggested for the sake of quiet and a longer conversation, that they should go round by the ferry.

"No, I thank you, I've had enough of that; we can walk along as quietly as you like, and turn a little back again if need be."

So slowly, side by side, the brother-officers paced towards the bridge; and little Puddock, with a serious countenance and blushing cheeks, and looking straight before him, made his astounding disclosure.

Puddock told things in a very simple and intelligible way, and Cluffe heard him in total silence; and just as he related the crowning fact, that he, the Lieutenant, was about to marry

Miss Rebecca Chatterworth, having reached the milestone by the footpath, Captain Cluffe raised his foot thereupon, without a word to Puddock, and began tugging at the strap of his legging, with a dismal red grin, and a few spluttering curses at the artificer of the article.

"And the lady has had the condescension to say that she has liked me for at least two years."

"And she hating you like poison, to my certain knowledge," laughed Captain Cluffe, very angrily, and swallowing down something. So they walked on a little way in silence, and Cluffe, who, with his face very red, and his mouth a good deal expanded, and down in the corners, was looking steadfastly forward, exclaimed suddenly—

"Well?"

"I see Cluffe," said Puddock; "you don't think it prudent—you think we mayn't be happy?"

"Prudent!" laughed Cluffe, with a variety of unpleasant meanings; and after a while—"And the General knows of it?"

"And approves it most kindly," said Puddock.

"What else can he do?" sneered Cluffe; "'tis a precious fancy—they are such cheats? Why you might be almost her grand-son, my dear Puddock, ha, ha, ha. 'Tis preposterous; you're sixteen years younger than I."

"If you can't congratulate me, 'twould be kinder not to say anything, Captain Cluffe; and nobody must speak in my presence of that lady, but with proper respect; and I—I thought, Cluffe, you'd have wished me well, and shaken hands, and said something—something—"

"Oh, as for that," said Cluffe, swallowing down his emotions again, and shaking hands with Puddock rather clumsily, and trying to smile, "I wish you well, heaven knows—everything good; why shouldn't I, by George? You know, Puddock, 'twas I who brought you together. And—and—am I at liberty to mention it?"

Puddock thought it better the news should be proclaimed from Belmont.

"Well, so I think myself," said Cluffe, and relapsed into silence till they parted, at the corner of the broad street of Chapelizod; and Cluffe walked at an astounding pace, on to his lodgings.

"Here's Captain Cluffe," said Mrs. Mason, to a plump youth, who had just made the journey from London, and was standing with the driver of a low-backed car, and saluted the Captain, who was stalking in without taking any notice.

"Little bill if you please, Captain."

"What is it?" demanded the Captain, grimly.

"Obediars come, sir."

"Obediars!" said the Captain. "What the plague do you mean, sir?"

"Obediars, sir, is the name we give him. The pelican, sir, from Messrs. Hamburgh and Slighe."

And the young man threw back a piece of green baize, and disclosed Obediah, who blinked with a tranquil countenance upon the Captain through the wires of a strong wooden cage. I doubt if the Captain ever looked so angry before or since. He glared at the pelican, and ground his teeth, and actually shook his cane in his fist; and if he had been one bit less prudent than he was, I think Obediars would then and there have slept with his fathers.

Cluffe whisked himself about, and plucked open the paper.

"And what the devil is all this for, sir? ten—twelve pounds ten shillings freightage and care on the way—and twenty-five, by George, sir—not far from forty pounds, sir," roared Cluffe.

"Where'll I bring him to, sir?" asked the driver.

The Captain bellowed an address we shan't print here.

"Curse him—curse the brute;" forty pounds! and the Captain swore hugely, "you scoundrel. Drive the whole concern out of that, sir. Drive him away, sir, or, by Jove, I'll break every bone in your body, sir."

And the Captain scaled the stairs, and sat down panting, and outside the window he heard the driver advising something about putting the Captain's bird to livery "till such time as he'd come to his senses;" and himself undertaking to wait opposite the door of his lodgings until his fare from Dublin was paid.

Though Cluffe was occasionally swayed by the angry passions, he was, on the whole, in his own small way, a longheaded fellow. He hated law, especially when he had a bad case; and accordingly he went down again, and told the man that he did not blame him for it—though the whole thing was an imposition; but that rather than have any words about it, he'd pay the account, and have done with it; and he stared again in the face of the pelican with an expression of rooted abhorrence and disgust, and the mild bird clapped its bill, perhaps, expecting some refreshments, and looking upon the Captain with a serene complacency, very provoking under the circumstances.

"How the devil people can like such misshapen, idiotic-looking, selfish, useless brutes; and, by George, it smells like a pole-cat—curse it; but some people have deuced queer fancies in more matters than one. The brute! on my soul, I'd like to shoot it."

However, with plenty of disputation over the items, and many oaths and vows, the gallant Captain, with a heavy and wrathful heart, paid the bill; and although he had sworn in his drawing-room that he'd eat the pelican before Aunt Rebecca should have it, he thought better also upon this point too, and it arrived that evening, at Belmont, with his respectful compliments.

---

CHAPTER XCIV.

IN WHICH CHARLES ARCHER PUTS HIMSELF UPON THE COUNTRY.

THE excitement was high in Chapelized when the news reached that a true bill was found against Charles Archer for the murder of Barnabas Sturk. Everywhere, indeed, the case was watched with uncommon interest; and when the decisive day arrived, and the Judge mounted the bench, and the jury were called over, and the challenge began, and the grim, gentlemanlike person with the white hair, and his right arm in a black silk sling, whispering to his attorney and now and again pencilling, with his left hand, a line to his counsel with that indescribable air of confidence and almost defiance, pleaded to the indictment "not guilty," and the dreadful business of the day began, the Court was crowded as it seldom had been before.

A short, clear, horrible statement unfolded the case for the Crown. Then the dying deposition of Sturk was put in evidence; then Irons, the clerk, was put up, and told his tale doggedly and distinctly, and was not to be shaken. "No, it was not true that he had ever been confined in a mad-house." "He had never had delirium tremens." "He had never heard that his wife thought him mad." "Yes, it was true he had pledged silver of his master's at the Pied Horse at Newmarket." "He knew it was a felony, but it was the prisoner who put it into his head and encouraged him to do it." "Yes, he would swear to that." "He had several times spoken to Lord Dunoran, when passing under the name of Mervyn, on the subject of his father being wronged." "He never had any promise from my lord, in case he should fix the guilt of that murder on some other than his father." Our friend, Captain Cluffe was called, and delivered his evidence in a somewhat bluff and peremptory, but on the whole effective way.

Charles Nutter, after some whispered consultation, was also .

called, and related what we have heard. "Yes, he had been arrested for the murder of Dr. Sturk, and now stood out on bail to answer that charge." Then followed some circumstances, one of which, the discovery of a piece of what was presumed to be the weapon with which the murder was perpetrated, I have already mentioned. Then came some evidence curious but quite clear, to show that the Charles Archer who had died at Florence, was not the Charles Archer who had murdered Beauclerc, but a gentleman who had served in the army, and had afterwards been for two years in Italy, in the employment of a London firm who dealt in works of art, and was actually resident in Italy at the time when the Newmarket murder occurred, and that the attempt to represent him as the person who had given evidence against the late Lord Dunoran was an elaborate and cunning contrivance of the prisoner at the bar. Then came the medical evidence.

Pell was examined, and delivered only half a dozen learned sentences; Toole, more at length, made a damaging comparison of the fragment of iron already mentioned, and the outline of the fractures in the deceased man's head; and Dillon was questioned generally, and was not cross-examined. Then came the defence.

The points were, that Sturk was restored to speech by the determined interposition of the prisoner at the bar, an unlikely thing if he was ruining himself thereby! That Sturk's brain had been shattered, and not cleared from hallucinations before he died; that having uttered the monstrous dream, in all its parts incredible, which was the sole foundation of the indictment against that every way respectable and eminent gentleman who stood there, the clerk, Irons, having heard something of it, had conceived the plan of swearing to the same story, for the manifest purpose of securing thereby the favour of the young Lord Dunoran, with whom he had been in conference upon this very subject without ever once having hinted a syllable against Mr. Paul Dangerfield until after Doctor Sturk's dream had been divulged ; and the idea of fixing the guilt of Beauclerc's murder upon that gentleman of wealth, family, and station, occurred to his intriguing, and unscrupulous mind.

Mr. Dangerfield, in the dock, nodded sometimes, or sneered or smirked with hollow cheeks, or shook his head in unison with the passing sentiment of the speaker, directing, through that hot atmosphere, now darkening into twilight, a quick glance from time to time upon the aspect of the jury, the weather-gauge of his fate, but altogether with a firm, manly, and sarcastic, and at times a somewhat offended air. The minutes had stolen away ; the Judge read his notes by candle-light, and charged, with dry and cranky evidence, dead against that man of integrity, fashion, and guineas ; and did not appear a bit disturbed at the idea of hanging him.

When the jury went in he had some soup upon the bench, and sipped it with a great noise. Mr. Dangerfield shook hands with his counsel, and smirked and whispered. Many people there felt queer, and grew pale in the suspense, and the general gaze was fixed upon the prisoner with a coarse curiosity, of which he seemed resolutely unconscious ; and five minutes passed by, and a minute or two more—it seemed a very long time—and then the door of the jury-room opened, and the gentlemen came stumbling in, taking off their hats, and silence was called. There was no need ; and the foreman, with a very pale and frightened face, handed down the paper.

And the simple message sounded through the court—

“ Guilty ! ”

And Mr. Dangerfield bowed, and lifted up a white, smiling countenance, all over shining with a slight moisture.

Then there was some whispering among the conductors of the prosecution ; and the leader stood up to say, that, in consequence of a communication from the law officers in England, where the prisoner was to be arraigned on a capital indictment, involving serious consequences to others—for the murder, he meant, of Mr. Beauclerc—the Crown wished that he should stand over for judgment until certain steps in that case had been taken at the other side. Then the Court inquired whether they had considered so and so; and the leader explained and satisfied his lordship, who made an order accordingly. And Mr. Dangerfield made a low bow, with a smirk, to his lordship, and a nod, with the same, to his counsel; and he turned, and the turnkey and darkness received him.

Mr. Dangerfield, or shall we say the villain, Charles Archer, with characteristic promptitude and coolness, availed himself of the interval to try every influence he could once have set in motion, and as it were to gather his strength for a mighty tussle with the king of terrors, when his pale fingers should tap at his cell-door. I have seen two of his letters, written with consummate plausibility and adroitness, and which have given me altogether a very high idea of his powers. But they were all received with a terrifying coldness or with absolute silence. There was no reasoning against an intuition. Every human being felt that the verdict was true, and that the judgment, when it came, would be right; and recoiled from the smiling gentleman, over whose white head the hempen circle hung like a diabolic glory.

Dangerfield was a great favourite with the gaoler, whom, so long as he had the command of his money, he had treated with a frank and convivial magnificence, and who often sat up to one o'clock with him, and enjoyed his stories prodigiously, for the sarcastic man of the world lost none of his amusing qualities; and—the fatigues of his barren correspondence ended—slept, and eat, and drank, pretty much as usual.

This Giant Despair, who carried the keys at his girdle, did not often get so swell a pilgrim into his castle, and was secretly flattered by his familiarity, and was quite willing to make rules bend a little, and the place as pleasant as possible to his distinguished guest, and give him, in fact, all his heart could desire, except a chance of escape.

“I’ve one move left—nothing very excellent—but sometimes, you know, a scurvy card enough will win the trick. Between you and me, my good friend, I have a thing to tell that 'twill oblige my Lord Dunoran very much to hear. My Lord Townshend will want his vote. He means to prove his peerage immediately, and he may give a poor devil a lift, you see—hey ? ”

So next day there came my Lord Dunoran and a magistrate; not Mr. Lowe—Mr. Dangerfield professed a contempt for him, and preferred any other. So it was Mr. Armstrong this time, and that is all I know of him.

Lord Dunoran was more pale than usual ; indeed he felt like to faint on coming into the presence of the man who had made his life so indescribably miserable, and throughout the interview he scarcely spoke six sentences, and not one word of reproach. The villain was down. It was enough.

Mr. Dangerfield was, perhaps, a little excited. He talked more volubly than usual, and once or twice there came a little flush over his pallid forehead and temples. But, on the whole, he was very much the same, brisk sardonic talker and polite gentleman whom Mr. Mervyn had so often discoursed with in Chapelizod. On this occasion, his narrative ran on uninterruptedly and easily, but full of horrors, like a satanic reverie.

“ Upon my honour, sir,” said Paul Dangerfield, with his head erect, “ I bear Mr. Lowe no ill-will. He is, you’ll excuse me, a thief-catcher by nature. He thinks he works from duty, public spirit, and other fine influences ; I know it is simply from an irrepressible instinct. I do assure you, I never yet bore any man the least ill-will. I’ve had to remove two or three, not because I hated them—I did not care a button for any—but because their existence was incompatible with my safety, which, sir, is the first thing to me, as yours is to you. Human laws we respect—ha, ha!—you and I, because they subserve our convenience, and just so long. When they tend, to our destruction, ’tis, of course, another thing.”

This, it must be allowed, was frank enough ; there was no bargain here; and whatever Mr. Dangerfield's plan might have been, it certainly did not involve making terms with Lord Dunoran beforehand, or palliating or disguising what he had done. So on he went.

"I believe in luck, sir, and there's the sum of my credo. I was wrong in taking that money from Beauclerc when I did, 'twas in the midst of a dismal run of ill-fortune. There was nothing unfair in taking it, though. The man was a cheat. It was not really his, and no one could tell to whom it belonged. I killed him to prevent his killing me. Precisely the same motive as that on which, in the name of justice, which means only the collective selfishness of my fellow-creatures, you design in cool blood to put me publicly to death. 'Tis only that you, gentlemen, think it contributes to your safety. That's the spirit of human laws. I applaud and I adopt it in my own case. Pray, sir," (to Mr. Armstrong), "do me the honour to try this snuff, 'tis real French rappee.

"But, sir, though I have had to do these things, which you or any other man of nerve would do with a sufficient motive, I never hurt any man without a necessity for it. My money I've made fairly, though in great measure by play, and no man can say I ever promised that which I did not perform. 'Tis quite true I killed Beauclerc in the manner described by Irons. That was put upon me, and I could not help it. I did right. 'Tis also true, I killed that scoundrel Glascock, as Irons related. Shortly after, being in trouble about money, and in danger of arrest, I went abroad, and changed my name and disguised my person.

"At Florence I was surprised to find a letter directed to Charles Archer. You may suppose it was not agreeable. But, of course, I would not claim it; and it went after all to him for whom it was intended. There was actually there a Mr. Charles Archer, dying of a decline. Three respectable English residents had made his acquaintance, knowing nothing of him, but that he was a sick countryman. When I learned all about it, I too got an introduction to him ; and when he died, I prevailed with one of them to send a note signed by himself and two more to the London lawyer who was pursuing me, simply stating that Charles Archer had died in Florence, to their knowledge, they having seen him during his last illness and attended his funeral.

"I told them that he had begged me to see this done, as family affairs made it necessary ; 'twas as well to use the event—and they did it without difficulty. I do not know how the obituary announcement got into the newspapers,—it was not my doing—and naming him as the evidence in the prosecution of my Lord Dunoran was a great risk, and challenged contradiction, but none came. Sir Philip Drayton was one of the signatures, and it satisfied the attorney.

"When I came to Chapelizod, I did not know that Irons was above ground, nor he either that I was living. We had wandered far enough asunder in the interval to make the chances very many we should never meet again. Yet here we met, and I knew him, and he me. But he's a nervous man, and whimsical.

"He was afraid of me, and never used his secret to force money from me. Still it was not pleasant. I did not know but that if I went away he might tell it. I weighed the matter ; 'tis true I thought there might have come a necessity to deal with him ; but I would not engage in anything of the sort, without an absolute necessity. But Dr. Sturk was different—a bull-headed, conceited fool. I thought I remembered his face at Newmarket, and, changed as it was, I was right, and learned all about him from Irons. I saw his mind was at work on me, though he could not find me out, and I could not well know what course a man like that might take, or how much he might have seen or remembered. That was not pleasant neither.

"The nature of the beast, Sturk, and his circumstances were dangerous. 'Twas necessary for my safety to make away with him. I tried it by several ways. I made a quarrel between him and Toole, but somehow it never came to a duel; and a worse one between him and Nutter, but that too failed to come to a fight. It was to be, sir, and my time had come. What I long suspected had arrived, and he told me in his own study he knew me, and wanted money. The money didn't matter; of that I could spare abundance; but the man who gets a sixpence from you on such terms is a tyrant and your master, and I can't brook slavery.

"I owed the fellow no ill-will; upon my honour, as a gentleman; I forgive him; as I hope he has forgiven me. It was all fair he should try. We can't help our instincts. There's something wolfish in us all. I was vexed at his d——d folly, though, and sorry to have to put him out of the way. However, I saw I must be rid of him.

"There was no immediate hurry. I could afford to wait a little. I thought he would walk home on the night I met him. He had gone into town in Colonel Strafford's carriage. It returned early in the afternoon without him. I knew his habits; he dined at Keating's ordinary at four o'clock; and Mercer, whom he had to speak with, would not see him, on his bill of exchange business, in his counting-house. Sturk told me so; and he must wait till half-past five at his lodgings. What he had to say was satisfactory, and I allowed five minutes for that.

"Then he might come home in a coach. But he was a close-fisted fellow and loved a shilling; so it was probable he would walk. His usual path was by the Star Fort, and through the thorn woods between that and the Magazine. So I met him. I said I was for town, and asked him how he had fared in his business; and turned with him, walking slowly as though to hear. I had that loaded whalebone in my pocket, and my sword, but no pistol. It was not the place for firearms; the noise would have made an alarm. So I turned sharp upon him and felled him. He knew by an intuition what was about to happen, for as the blow fell he yelled 'murder.' That d——d fellow, Nutter, in the wood at our right, scarce a hundred yards away, halloed in answer. I had but time to strike him two blows on the top of his head that might have killed an ox. I felt the metal sink at the second in his skull, and would have pinked him through with my sword, but the fellow was close on me, and I thought I knew the voice for Nutter's. I stole through the bushes swiftly, and going along into the hollow under the Magazine, and thence on.

"There was a slight fog upon the Park, and I met no one. I got across the Park-wall, over the quarry, and so down by the stream at Coyle's, and on to the road near my house. No one was in sight, so I walked down to Chapelizod to show myself. Near the village tree I met Dr. Toole. I asked him if Nutter was in the club, and he said no—nor at home, he believed, for his boy had seen him more than half-an-hour ago leave his hall-door, dressed for the road.

"So I made as if disappointed, and turned back again, assured that Nutter was the man. I was not easy, for I could not be sure that Sturk was dead. Had I been allowed a second or two more, I'd have made sure work of it. Still I was nearly sure. I could not go back now and finish the business. I could not say whether he lay there any longer, and if he did, how many men-Nutter might have about him by this time. So, sir, the cast was made, I could not mend it, and must abide my fortune, be it good or ill.

"Not a servant saw me go out or return. I came in quietly, and went into my bed-room and lighted a candle. 'Twas a blunder, a blot, but a thousand to one it was not hit. I washed my hands. There was some blood on the whalebone, and on my fingers. I rolled the loaded whalebone up in a red handkerchief, and locked it into my chest of drawers, designing to destroy it, which I did, so soon as the servants were in bed, and then I felt a chill and a slight shiver;—'twas only that I was an older man. I was cool enough, but a strain on the mind was more to me then than twenty years before. So I drank a dram, and I heard a noise outside my window. 'Twas then that stupid dog, Cluffe, saw me, as he swears.

"Well, next day Sturk was brought home; Nutter was gone, and the suspicion attached to him. That was well. But, though Pell pronounced that he must die without recovering consciousness, and that the trepan would kill him instantaneously, I had a profound misgiving that he might recover speech and recollection. I wrote as exact a statement of the case to my London physician—a very great man—as I could recollect, and had his answer, which agreed exactly with Dr. Pell's. 'Twas agreed on all hands the trepan would be certain death. Days, weeks, or months—it mattered not what the interval—no returning glimmer of memory could light his death-bed. Still, sir, I presaged evil. He was so long about dying.

"I'm telling you everything, you see. I offered Irons what would have been a fortune to him—he was attending occasionally in Sturk's sick-room, and assisting in dressing his wounds—to watch his opportunity and smother him with a wet handkerchief. I would have done it myself afterwards, on the sole opportunity that offered, had I not been interrupted.

"I engaged, with Mrs. Sturk's approval, Doctor Dillon. I promised him five hundred guineas to trepan him. That young villain, I could prove, bled Alderman Sherlock to death to please the Alderman's young wife. Who'd have thought the needy profligate would have hesitated to plunge his trepan into the brain of a dying man—a corpse, you may say, already—for five hundred guineas? I was growing feverish under the protracted suspense. I was haunted by the apprehension of Sturk's recovering his consciousness and speech, in which case I should have been reduced to my present rueful situation; and I was resolved to end that cursed uncertainty.

"When I thought Dillon had forgot his appointment in his swinish vices, I turned my mind another way. I resolved to leave Sturk to nature, and clench the case against Nutter, by evidence I would have compelled Irons to swear. As it turned out, that would have been the better way. Had Sturk died without speaking, and Nutter hanged for his death, the question could have opened no more, and Irons would have been nailed to my interest.

"I viewed the problem every way. I saw the danger from the first and provided many expedients, which, one after the other, fortune frustrated. I can't confidentially say even now that it would have been wiser to leave Sturk to die, as the doctors said he must. I had a foreboding, in spite of all they could say, he would wake up before he died and denounce me. If 'twas a mistake, 'twas a fated one, and I could not help it.

"So, sir, you see I've nothing to blame myself for—though all has broken down.

"I guessed when I heard the sound at the hall-door of my house that Sturk or Irons had spoken, and that they were come to take me. Had I broken through them, I might have made my escape. It was long odds against me, but still I had a chance—that's all. And the matter affecting my Lord Dunoran's innocence, I'm ready to swear, if it can serve his son—having been the undesigned cause of some misfortunes to you, my lord, in my lifetime."

Lord Dunoran said nothing, he only bowed his head.

So Dangerfield, when his statement respecting the murder of Beauclerc had been placed clearly in writing, made oath of its truth, and immediately when this was over (he had, while they were preparing the statement, been walking up and down his flagged chamber), he grew, all on a sudden, weak, and then very flushed, and they thought he was about to take a fit; but speedily he recovered himself, and in five minutes' time was much as he had been at the commencement.

After my lord and Mr. Armstrong went away, he had the gaoler with him, and seemed very sanguine about getting his pardon, and was very brisk and chatty, and said he'd prepare his petition in the morning, and got in large paper for drafting it on, and said, "I suppose at the close of this commission they will bring me up for judgment; that will be the day after to-morrow, and I must have my petition ready." And he talked away like a man who had got a care off his mind, and is in high spirits; and when grinning, beetle-browed Giant Despair shook his hand, and wished him luck at parting, he stopped him, laying his white hand upon his herculean arm, and, said he, "I've a point to urge they don't suspect. I'm sure of my liberty: what do you think of that—hey?" and he laughed.

So they parted in a sprightly, genial way; and in the morning the turnkey called the gaoler up at an unseasonable hour, and told him that Mr. Dangerfield was dead.

The gaoler lay in the passage outside the prisoner's cell, with his bed across the door, which was locked, and visited him at certain intervals. The first time he went in there was nothing remarkable. It was but half-an-hour after the gaoler had left. Mr. Dangerfield, for so he chose to be called, was dozing very quietly in his bed, and just opened his eyes, and nodded on awaking, as though he would say, "Here I am," but did not speak.

When, three hours later, the officer entered, having lighted his candle at the lamp, he instantly recoiled. "The room felt so queer," said he, "I thought I'd fainted, and I drew back. I tried it again a bit further in, and 'twas worse, and the candle almost went out—'twas as if the devil was there. I drew back quick, and I called the prisoner, but no word was there, then I locks the door, and called Michael; and when he came we called the prisoner again, but to no purpose. Then we opened the door, and I made a rush, and smashed the window to let in air. We had to wait outside a good while before we could venture in; and when we did, there he was lying like a man asleep on his bed, with his nightcap on, and his hand under his cheek, and he smiling down on the flags, very sly, like a man who has won something cleverly. He was dead, and his limbs cold by this time."

There was an inquest. Some said it was a heart-disease, and others an exhalation from the prison floor. He was dead, that was all the jury could say for certain, and they found 'twas "by the visitation of God."

The niece of this gaoler said she well remembered her uncle, when a very old man, three years before the rebellion, relating that Mr. Dangerfield came by his death in consequence of some charcoal in a warming-pan he had prevailed on him to allow him for his bed, he having complained of cold.

Mr. Irons, of course, left Chapelizod. He took with him the hundred guineas which Mr. Dangerfield had given him, as, also, it was said, a handsome addition made to that fund by open-handed Dr. Walsingham; but somehow, being much pressed for time, he forgot good Mistress Irons, who remained behind and let lodgings pretty much as usual.

---

CHAPTER XCV.

THE STORY ENDS.

THE old minutes of the Irish House of Lords can better explain than I the parliamentary process by which all the consequences of the judgment against the late Lord Dunoran were abrogated, as respected his son. An ancient name rescued from the shadow of dishonour, and still greater estates, made my Lord and Lady as happy as such things can. So for the recluse Mervyn, and the fair Gertrude Chatterworth, our story ends like a fairy tale.

A wedding in those days was a celebration and a feast; and it was deemed fitting that the union of Gertrude Chatterworth and the youthful Lord Dunoran should await the public vindication of his family, and the authentic restoration of all their rights and possessions. On the eve of this happy day, leaning on the youthful arm of kindly Dan Loftus, there came a figure not seen there for many months before, very much changed, grown, oh, how old ! It was the good Rector who asked to see Miss Gertrude.

And so when he entered the room, she ran to meet him with a little cry ; and she threw her arms about his neck and sobbed a good deal on that old, cassocked shoulder, and longed to ask him to let her be as a daughter to him. But he understood her, and, after a while, he wished her joy, very kindly. And my Lord Dunoran came in and was very glad to see him, and very tender and reverent too ; and the good Doctor, as he could not be at the wedding, wished to say a word "on the eve of the great change which my dear young friend—little Gertie, we used to call her—is about to make." And so he talked to them both. It was an affectionate little homily, and when he had done, and had risen to take leave, he said in his gentle and simple way—

"And I brought you a little present—a neck-lace and earrings—old-fashioned, I'm afraid—they were my dear mother's diamonds, and were to have been——"

Here there was a little pause—they knew what was in his mind—and he dried his eyes quickly.

"And won't you take them, Gertie, for poor little Lily's keepsake. And so—well, well—little Gertie—I taught you your catechism—Dear, dear ! Little Gerty going to be married ! And may God Almighty bless her to you, and you to her, with length of days, and all goodness ; and with children, the inheritors of your fair forms, and all your graces, to gladden your home with love and duty, and to close your eyes at last, with tender reverence ; and to walk after you, when your time is over, in the same happy and honourable paths."

Miss Gertrude was crying, and with two quick little steps she took his knotted old hand, and kissed it fervently and said—

"I thank you, sir, you've always been so good to me ; I wish I could tell you—and won't you come to us, sir, and see us very often—when we are settled—and bring good Mr. Loftus, and dear old Sally ; and thank you, sir, with all my heart, for your beautiful presents, and for your noble advice, sir, which I will never forget, and for your blessing, and I wish I could show you how very much I love and reverence you."

And my Lord Dunoran, though he was smiling, looked as if he had been crying too. But men, you know, don't like to be detected in that weakness, though everybody knows there are moments when bonus Homerus dormitat.

Good Doctor Walsingham made Dan Loftus his curate. But when in the course of time a day came when the old Rector was to meet his parishioners no more, and the parish was vacant, I do not hear that honest Dan succeeded to it. Indeed I'm afraid that it needs sometimes a spice of the devil, or at least of the word, to get on in the church. But Lord Dunoran took him with him to the embassy to Lisbon, and afterwards he remained in his household as his domestic chaplain, much beloved and respected. And there he had entire command of his Lordship's fine library, and compiled and composed, and did everything but publish and marry.

In due time the fair Magnolia made the amorous and formidable O'Flaherty happy. Single blessedness was not for her, and it is due to her to say, she turned out one of the best housewives in Chapelizod, and made the Fireworker account for every shilling of his pay and other revenues, and managed the commissariat and all other departments to admiration. She cured her lord very nearly of boosing, and altogether of duelling. One combat only he fought after his marriage, and it was rumoured that the blooming Magnolia actually chastised the gigantic delinquent with her own fair hand. That, however, I don't believe. But unquestionably she did in other ways, lead the contumacious warrior so miserable a life for some months after that, as he averred to the Major, with tears in his eyes, it would have been "more to his taste to have been shot on the occasion." At first, of course, the Fireworker showed fight, and sometimes broke loose altogether; but in the end "his mouth was made," his paces formed, and he became a very serviceable and willing animal. But if she was strong, she was also generous, and very popular for her good nature and fearlessness. And they made a very happy, as well as a comely couple.

At length came the day of the nuptials—a grand day for Belmont—a grand day for the town. Half a dozen flags were up and floating in the autumnal sun. The band of the Royal Irish Artillery played noble and cheering strains upon the lawns of Belmont. There were pipers and fiddlers beside, for rustic merry-makers under the poplars. Barrels of strong ale and sparkling cider were broached on the grass; and plenty of substantial fare kept the knives and forks clattering under the marquees by the hedge-row. The rude and hospitable feudalism of old times had not died out yet; marriage being an honourable estate, the bride and bridegroom did not steal away in a travelling carriage, trying to pass for something else, to unknown regions, but remained courageously upon the premises, the central figures of a genial gala.

Need I describe the wedding? It always seems to me that I saw it, and see it still; I've heard the old folk talk it over so often. The reader's fancy will take the business off my hands. "What's a play without a marriage? and what is a marriage if one sees nothing of it?" says Sir Roger, in Gay's tragi-comic pastoral. "Let him have his humour, but set the doors wide open that we may see how all goes on."

(Sir Roger at the door, pointing.)

"So natural! d'ye see now, neighbours! The ring i'faith. To have and to hold! Right again; well play'd, Doctor; well play'd, son Thomas. Come, come, I'm satisfied. Now for the fiddles and dances."

1870

1871

1872

1873

1874

1875

1876

1877

1878

1879

1880

1881

1882

1883

1884

1885

1886

1887

1888

1889

1890

3 2044 018 798 157

A FINE IS INCURRED IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW.

5287181

HALL USE

OCT 2 '76 H

5087312 1997

CANCELLED

BOOK DUE WID

NOV 2 1977

BOOK DUE WID

NOV 6 1978

WIDENER

BOOK DUE WID

DEC 29 1977

CANCELLED

5924932

WIDENER

FEB 10 1997

CANCELLED

WIDENER

BOOK DUE WID

JUN 10 1981

CANCELLED

WIDENER

FEB 10 1997

CANCELLED

WIDENER

FEB 10 1997

CANCELLED

